I have no objection to any State which wishes to adopt a program of that kind adopting it. I have no objection to a municipality which wishes to go into the power business going into it. The question I am discussing is whether or not under the Constitution we may amplify such authority by legislation such as we are attempting here, and the reason why I have objected to this proposed amendment to the present law is because I think it does materially amplify the authority that has been given to the Tennessee Valley Authority along the lines that we have just been discussing. In other words, I think the principle is all involved at present, as I have said to the Senator from Nebraska, and that there is sufficient in the law at the present time so that a clean-cut decision may be rendered as to whether or not the Government has the constitutional right to create an agency that can go into a business of this kind.

What I have been fearful of, and what I think the passage of this bill will reflect, is that Congress has not only passed the previous legislation but it is rededicating and amplifying it by passing this proposed amendment to the existing law. I think the Senator from Nebraska will admit that it will have that effect.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, what is the objection to that?

Mr. DICKINSON. Why not let the Court first pass on the former act?

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose it is found in administering the act that Congress has failed to put in a comma where one should be or to dot an "i", even if an injunction has been issued on that ground, the Senator would not object to passing an act to remedy that defect? In other words, in this matter, if we all want to be fair—and I think the Senator does—we ought to give the T. V. A. a fair, honest bill of rights; and when the question goes to the Supreme Court, as it eventually will, if they decide that Judge Grubb is right and that the T. V. A. has not any of this authority, it will be something that we will have to submit to although it will be a bitter pill to take. But in the meantime it does not seem to me, as I look at it, that anybody ought to object to this bill, which simply proposes to clarify the existing act.

Mr. DICKINSON. I think it amplifies it very materially. In other words, it seems to me that the authority given the T. V. A. would be greatly amplified by this measure, if passed, so far as their right is concerned to go out and take over generating plants or transmission lines, and their authority to go into a locality and have their way in the matter of trying to have that locality cooperate with it and take the power from the Federal agency.

I also find in this Minnesota document that the bills that have been sent out from Washington have this further suggestion of legislation to—Create a rural electrification board with authority to supply energy to any person or corporation without obtaining a franchise, and to issue bonds without limit not exceeding a life of 40 years, nor exceeding an interest rate of 6 percent.

I do not think that the Federal Government ought to be recommending that sort of thing.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, is the Senator quoting from the proposed amendment to the law?

Mr. DICKINSON. No; I am quoting from the proposal sent out by the Federal Government to the State of Minnesota asking them to enact legislation which fits in with a type of Government power control such as we are discussing today.

A further suggestion is to—

Authorize any municipality to issue bonds in an unlimited amount by a three-fourths vote of its governing body for any public-works project of any kind whatsoever.

It does not seem to me that the Federal Government ought to be in the business of telling any municipality in any State how they may issue bonds or where they may issue bonds. I am not charging the Tennessee Valley Authority, I will say to the Senator, with making this suggestion; I think it comes from another branch of the Government, which is attempting to put on a program of electrification all over the country, and I am going to refer to that a little later.

Another suggestion is that the model bill should—

Authorize any city, village, or town in Minnesota to acquire and operate public utilities, specifically naming as public utilities, street-railway systems, bus lines, telephone systems, water-works, artificial or natural gas works, electric light, heat or power works, public docks, union depots, terminal systems, ice plants, stone quarries, and public markets.

This is a suggestion from the Federal Government, not from the T. V. A., which we are discussing today, but it is in line with the apparent motive that prompts this agency to suggest that the various States in the Union should modify their laws with reference to the public ownership and operation of utilities.

Also to—Create a State commission to administer power districts under the guise of raising the standards of living in rural areas—

That fits in with what the T. V. A. are now attempting to do—to issue bonds in any amount, make any contracts, and exercise power of eminent domain.

Furthermore, we find that there is a Presidential set-up under the new $4,880,000,000 act recently passed which is in control of Morris L. Cooke, whose nomination, I think, is now before the Senate for confirmation. I noticed in the New York Times of recent date that he gives the various functions which he thinks ought to be carried out under the law referred to:

To facilitate handling, the projects were divided into four groups, as follows:

1. Federal projects: Those which originate in the departments or agencies of the Federal Government and are entirely financed by it.

2. Non-Federal projects: Those planned by individuals, public bodies, or political subdivisions and financed by loan or grant, or both. Applications on these will come through the Public Works Administration and its State directors.

3. Work-relief projects: Those financed and carried out by the works progress administration. These originate among the various political subdivisions of the country and their applications will come through the works progress administration and its local and State offices.

4. Administrative expense projects: Those which originate within the Federal departments and agencies and which provide for administrative expenses in planning, preparing, and carrying out projects.

Purchase of $5,000,000 worth of additional equipment was authorized today by Robert Fechner, director of the Civilian Conservation Corps.

That is in cooperation with this program.

What I have read shows where these agencies are gradually leading us.

I also find in today's New York Times an explanation of the program of Mr. Cooke, in which he says:

Mr. Cooke indicated that if private concerns cooperated with the Government in extending electricity to farmers his policy would be to build up going concerns, and lend them money where necessary in the hope that with the production of greater power, the rates might be reduced.

He warned, however, that if the industry declined to offer facilities to the rural sections at reasonable rates, the Government might be compelled to buy plants here and there to control rates.

Since when should a Government agency be the supreme court on the question of electric-light rates in this country? It seems to me that it is the right of the people of Tennessee to fix the light rates which they are compelled to pay. It is the right of the people of the State of Iowa to fix the electric-light rates which they are compelled to pay. In Iowa we have always fixed our own electric-light rates, and I do not know of any particular abuse of the privilege. I do not know why we should be creating an agency of the Federal Government which is going to say, "If you do not do this in the way we want you to do it, and sell power at the price at which we want you to sell it, we are going to come in and assume an authority over you and compel you to comply with our wishes."

I can well remember reading years ago that when the United States established the Post Office Department it was stated all over the world that we were attempting to do too much for the citizens of our country.

I do not believe that anyone wants now to retract one single, solitary privilege we have ever granted, so far as the free distribution of the mail is concerned. I can also remember that when we started Federal aid to the roads, people thought we were going too far, and I do not know but what we have gone further than we should have gone. Now, the question is, Should we go further than that and assume Federal control over education? Do we want to assume authority of that kind?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, the Senator is citing incidents in past history which he remembers, but of which I have no recollection, though I have read about them.

Mr. DICKINSON. I said I had read about them; I do not remember them.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not old enough to go back that far in memory, but I think the Senator has stated fairly a proposition that has been true ever since the dawn of civilization, namely, that there never was an improvement made, there never was anything in the way of advancement proposed, there never was any movement in the direction of progress undertaken but there was always somebody there to fight it; and that will always be true, I presume.

Mr. DICKINSON. That is an indication of my fairness, I hope the Senator will admit?

I had referred to the public-highway situation. The next question, Is the Federal Government going to assume control over the educational facilities of the country? Are we going to say that the distribution of electricity is a function that must be put on a parity with some of these other proposals? I take it those who are anxious, as I have shown, to have the Federal Government reach out in all these different directions are willing that the Federal Government shall assume control and shall become the supreme authority in the matter of electric rates, though it is true we are starting in with a unit that only controls a district, one watershed, or whatever one may wish to call it.

Quoting further from the statement of Mr. Cooke—and this again is going to have a very far-reaching influence, I will say, in the matter of the expenditure of some $300,000,000 under the Public Works Administration:

Every encouragement would be given to the private companies to enjoy additional revenues from rural electrification, but he added, if this is not done, the Government might have to form a Delaware corporation, similar to the Electric Farm and Home Authority, now prevailing in the Tennessee Valley, to carry out its plans to give the farmer the same facilities as are now enjoyed in the urban sections.

I am just as friendly to the farmer, I think, as is anyone; I want to see him have every privilege he can possibly have and can possibly afford. I believe that electrification can come from a dozen different sources. All our electricity does not need to be produced at big dams.

As a matter of fact, we have units which supply small towns, and villages and even small homes, known as the "Delco" electric-light plant. I do not know how successful they are now. I know they were used extensively in Iowa, and I think many of them are still being used. At any rate, prior to the time when there was such a widespread distribution by high lines, they were in common use.

My reason for suggesting this is that the privilege of enjoying electricity is not one which at the present time is denied to many people if they really want it. I know the object of the legislation is to have the Federal Government use every endeavor it can to distribute electrical energy at the lowest possible rate. I have no objection to that objective; I think it is a worthy one.

On the other hand, I believe it is the duty of the Tennessee Valley Authority to see that every dollar that is being paid to it out of the Federal Treasury shall be paid back. I believe that is the ambition of the Senator from Nebraska, who has fathered the legislation. I know it is the ambition of Dr. Morgan, who heads the Tennessee Valley Authority. I do not know that the project is sufficiently well planned that we can give assurance to the American taxpayer that the money will be paid back; and that is an assurance which I think we ought to have, especially in view of the fact that we are now saying that for a period of 5 years we are going to guarantee the bonds of the T. V. A., principal and interest. That puts every American citizen into the electric-light business in the Tennessee Valley. That makes every citizen of every State of the Union an endorser of the notes to the amount of $100,000,000.

The question I have in mind is whether the program has been worked out to the point where those in charge are going to be able to say definitely this money will be repaid. I remember very well when many irrigation projects were submitted to Congress and were shown to be plausible, and yet it is a sad story for us to contemplate when we analyze them and learn how few of them were ever able to put back into the Federal Treasury the advances made in their behalf.

I find that oftentimes the Government authorities are unable to complete the construction of their projects within the figure of the original estimate. I remember reading the other day in the famous book known as "Handout", wherein Dr. Tugwell says, with reference to the A. A. A., that he thought 50 men in Washington would be all that would be necessary to operate the Agriculture Adjustment Administration. That is the statement made in the book, a copy of which I have here. It is a statement made in the hearings and I have a copy of the hearings. Yet at the present time there are over 5,000 people here in the city of Washington on the payroll of the A. A. A. against Dr. Tugwell's judgment and advice that 50 men would be all that would be necessary.

There is another phase of this matter about which we ought to think seriously. I note in certain sections there is now being circulated certain propaganda, and I presume everyone knows it. I do not think I have any particular information that other Senators do not possess, but I find that as the attempt is made to develop various projects under the Tennessee Valley Authority, they are discouraging other sections of the country. I remember very well that not long ago it was suggested that the pottery industry was one of the industries of the country suffering severely from the depression, and yet I now find that the people in the pottery section of the State of Ohio are being circularized and invited to move their plant into the Tennessee Valley where there is cheap power. I am not charging that to the Tennessee Valley Authority. It is one of the incidental things that has grown up outside of the Authority.

Here is a letter to the Harker Pottery Co., of East Liverpool, Ohio, in which it is suggested, through a certain industrial and city planner at Florence, Ala., as follows:

We do not know if you have noticed the constant references throughout newspapers and periodicals on the part of the Tennessee Valley Authority officials predicting that this is destined to become the center of ceramics industry in America, and the Budget just submitted to Congress carries a large appropriation for the development of this industry in the Tennessee Valley.

That is true. The Budget does carry that appropriation. I have forgotten the amount, but I think it is an experimental appropriation for research, and so forth.

Besides being in an advantageous location to develop the field for distribution in that part of the country which is destined to grow more rapidly than any other section of the country for a number of years, there is also this vast potential field connected with governmental activities.

There is probably no project which the present administration is more desirous of making a success than the Tennessee Valley project, and while I cannot say this officially, I believe you will find that the Tennessee Valley Authority will cooperate to the limit on a basis that those who helped to make the new deal a success they in turn will reciprocate to the fullest extent.

This letter was received by the Harker Pottery Co. of East Liverpool, Ohio, and was signed "E. C. Pfahl Associates, industrial and city planning, Florence, Ala."

Further showing the intent of the present organization is largely that of power rather than of either flood control or navigation, I cite an article, The Tennessee Valley Looks to the Future, by Walter E. Myer. This article was published in the journal of the National Education Association and reads in part:

The Tennessee Valley Authority, or the T. V. A., as it is called, is doing its work in this territory. It is studying social conditions and social needs. It is making a survey of the natural resources, the soil, minerals, forests. It is canvassing the possibilities of water-power development and is actively at work harnessing the waters of the Tennessee and its branches, creating a great integrated power system. It is already generating electric power and selling it at low rates. It is devising means of preserving the fertility of the soil, of checking erosion, of encouraging the reforestation of the wooded regions.

The reason I read that is to show the ramifications, to indicate where this is leading us, and that outside of the production of surplus electrical energy we are reaching into practically every phase of life in the Tennessee Valley. We could not pass an original act for that purpose. We could not pass an original act purely as legislation setting up a board for that purpose. If we have given such authority, we have given it as incidental to that which we know is permissible under the Constitution. The question is, Where is the line going to be drawn? Are the powers of the Constitution sufficiently broad that from one power incidental powers may be conceded so as to make an incidental project the primary project, and the real authorization under the Constitution a minor project? That, I think, is the real question that is going to be decided under the decision of Judge Grubb.

Let me quote further from this article. Mr. Myer, who, as I understand, was an employee of the Tennessee Valley Authority, wrote this article:

In showing what can be done in planning the future of industry and agriculture, and in maintaining high standards of workmanship in all its operations, it will be suggesting what may be done elsewhere. It is working not only to promote industrial growth but to see that this growth contributes to the welfare of human beings. If the T. V. A. succeeds in directing business and agricultural development so that the people of the valley are happier and more secure, it will serve as an object lesson to the Nation.

No one can object to that motive. No one can complain that it is not a worthy motive. The question is whether or not Congress under the Constitution has the power to grant that privilege in view of all the circumstances and the limitation imposed upon us. Article 10 of the Constitution provides that all powers are reserved to the States unless specifically granted to the Federal Government. That being the case, the question is whether or not we have the authority to reach out and control the States in the various phases of social development. To my mind the Supreme Court decision will be very far-reaching when it undertakes to define just what our privilege is under the Constitution.

Let me quote further from this article:

It is because of the possibilities involved in the developments of the next few decades, possibilities of tragic import to the whole Nation, that the T. V. A. finds this valley such a fertile field for its program of economic and social development with human well-being rather than excessive manufacturing profits as the guiding aim.

In other words, it is not the question of navigation; it is not the question of flood control; it is the question of social development which is uppermost in the minds of those who are developing this project.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes.

Mr. BONE. Since the Senator emphasizes that, I wonder if he thinks that social welfare, or the thought of social welfare being stressed and emphasized is a tragedy. I wonder what the Senator thinks governments come into existence for—merely to serve a few private interests, or to serve social welfare? If that is to be the theory of government, where are we going, and where are we heading?

Mr. DICKINSON. May I ask, if it was desired to make a social-welfare bill out of this measure, why was it not so named?

Mr. BONE. Very well; but the Senator presumes to criticize it on that basis, and that is why I ask the question.

Mr. DICKINSON. No; I am criticizing the bill on the basis that we thought we were doing one thing under the Constitution, and the way this project is developing we are doing an entirely different thing. I am not opposed to social welfare. I am not opposed to human progress. The question is, first, whether or not we have the authority to do this thing; and, second, are we doing the thing we thought we were doing when we passed the original law?

Mr. BONE. If the Senator will yield again, my questions were impelled by the fact that the Senator is basing his criticism of what has been done down in the Tennessee Valley on the fact that these activities have projected themselves into the realm of social welfare, rather than on a mere proposition of law.

Mr. DICKINSON. No; what the Senator from Washington is trying to do is to make it appear that I am not for social advancement, and so forth. I am just as much for social advancement as he is, and I desire to say that the people of my State have advanced just as far as have the people of the State of Washington under the Senator's splendid guidance.

Mr. BONE. I am very happy to know that the people of Iowa are thoroughly happy in the possession of a Senator who feels as does the Senator from Iowa. If the people of Iowa are happy, certainly I should make no objection.

Mr. DICKINSON. Quoting further:

When the Tennessee Valley Authority learns about the minerals and soils and railroads and highways and waterways and water-power sites, it will be in a better position to give industrial advice. It may discover, for example, that kaolin and feldspar are located in a certain district.

The State of Tennessee has been developing its industries for a good many years. I am wondering whether or not we are creating a Federal agency that will go into Tennessee and assume authority which is really vested in the State under the Constitution and which it has been able to exercise.

I could go on and refer to the various questions of soil erosion, and so forth. I have simply tried to outline this matter and to raise the question, first, whether or not we are authorized to take this action under the Constitution; second, whether or not this program was contemplated by those who supported the original legislation at the time of its passage; and, third, whether or not we desire to say that the many taxpayers of the United States shall underwrite this proposition by guaranteeing $100,000,000 in bonds to be used in this enterprise.

With these suggestions I have but one more request, and that is that I be permitted to insert in the RECORD, following my remarks, the conclusions of law of Judge Grubb as set forth in his opinion. I think the Senator from Nebraska is fully familiar with them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

(1) The Congress has no constitutional authority to authorize Tennessee Valley Authority or any other Federal agency to undertake the operation, essentially permanent in character, of a utility system, for profit, involving the generation, transmission, and commercial distribution of electricity within State domain, having no reasonable relation to a lawful governmental use.

(2) The power program of Tennessee Valley Authority relating to the generation, transmission, and commercial sale of electricity, as shown by this record, substantially utility in type and permanent in its implications, is not related to any lawful governmental function and is beyond the power of Congress to authorize.

(3) If and to the extent that the Tennessee Valley Authority Act should be construed as authorizing Tennessee Valley Authority to operate an electric generating, transmission, and commercial distribution system, of the character and type proposed and intended by Tennessee Valley Authority as shown on this record, such act would be beyond the power of Congress and void. It is, accordingly, unnecessary to determine whether the act authorizes such operation by Tennessee Valley Authority or whether the act, because of inclusion of illegal objectives, delegation of legislative power, legislative uncertainty, or for other reason, is invalid.

(4) The Congress is without authority to authorize an agency of the Government to bind itself or the Government to a long-term commercial servitude for the operation within State domain of an electric network involving generation, transmission, and delivery of electricity essentially proprietary and utility in type and having no relation to any lawful governmental function.

(5) The proposal or undertaking of T. V. A. to bind or commit itself to operate the steam-electric or hydroelectric units at Muscle Shoals to produce electricity independently of and not required for Government use for the sole purpose of proprietary or commercial sale to the public, at wholesale or retail, for nongovernmental uses, is beyond the power of Congress to authorize.

(6) Assuming, without deciding, that the steam-electric plant and hydroelectric generators installed at Muscle Shoals were lawfully constructed for national defense and that by reason of the termination, suspension, or obsolescence of the original use there is not sufficient governmental use to absorb currently their entire capacity, Congress cannot lawfully authorize the Tennessee Valley Authority to operate such parts of the plant as are no longer required for governmental use or as are not currently required for governmental use for the sole purpose of generating electricity admittedly not required for governmental use in order to market this electricity for profit, either by sale at the dam or in support of a commercial utility system proposed to be established and operated by Tennessee Valley Authority.

(7) The production of electricity for the sole purpose of filling long-time contracts or commitments entered into by Tennessee Valley Authority for the supply of the public with electricity, at wholesale or retail, under the circumstances shown on this record, is not production for a lawful governmental use.

(8) There may be surplus emplacements and surplus capacity in hydrogenerators installed at Wilson Dam, that is, emplacements or capacities not presently required for the production of electricity for governmental use. This circumstance does not authorize the Congress to authorize the use by the United States or any agency thereof of those emplacements or the hydrogenerators not required for governmental use in the commercial operation of the units in the production and sale of electricity to the public.

(9) There are decisive distinctions between (a) the sale or conservation (for future use) by the Government of Government property lawfully acquired but no longer required or not presently required for Government use and (b) the utilization by the Government itself of such property for the conduct of an ordinary commercial business on or by means of the property. The same or like distinctions exist as to power plants, emplacements, and hydrogenerators lawfully constructed by the Government for a governmental use and no longer required or not presently required for governmental use. As to such units Congress may authorize the sale, or such custodianship of the units as may reasonably relate to their reservation or conservation for governmental use, but this principle does not authorize Congress to create and authorize T. V. A. or any wholly owned agency of the United States to use the property for commercial and proprietary production of electricity for sale to the public for nongovernmental use.

(10) There are distinctions in law under the evidence in this record between:

(a) The leasing of power emplacements lawfully established in navigation or national-defense dams, awaiting their related need for governmental use.

(b) The lawful installation of turbo-generators in such dams or the lawful construction of steam-electric plants relating to Government use and the leasing of such emplacement and generators or plants.

(c) The installation of the hydroelectric units and the commercial operation of the plant by the Government itself in generating electricity for sale at the generating plant to fill commercial contracts or utility service assumed by the Government.

(d) The commercial business of generating electricity and its commercial transmission and distribution in service utility in type.

The function intended by T. V. A. under the evidence in relation to service utility in type, in the area ceded by the contract of January 4, 1934, transcends the function of conservation or disposition of Government property, involves continuing service and commercial functions by the Government to fill contracts not governmental in origin or character.

(11) Except when the Tennessee Valley Authority operates the electric plants and properties subjected to its care by the Tennessee Valley Authority Act (assuming its validity), substantially in excess of requirements and marginal reserves for governmental use, there is not a sufficient amount of electricity to set up a commercial electricity program such as proposed by T. V. A. To the extent that Tennessee Valley Authority intentionally commits itself to sell in the market and thereupon produces electricity to fill the commitment, in known excess of any requirement and reasonable margin for governmental use, it cannot properly be said that Tennessee Valley Authority is disposing of a surplus unavoidably or reasonably produced in supplying a current Government requirement.

(12) Congress cannot by substantially overestimating or overproviding the electricity required for a lawful governmental use lawfully capitalize the error to the extent of authorizing the Tennessee Valley Authority or other agency of the United States to employ the excess capacity as a means for establishing and operating the equivalent of a public-service utility network in the Tennessee Valley under the circumstances shown by this record.

(13) Congress cannot authorize the construction of a plant for national defense and thereupon, when the war is over or in anticipation of another war, utilize the plant for ordinary commercial operation by the United States in the production of commodities for proprietary sale for profit in competition with citizens of the State. That principle covers the utilization by Tennessee Valley Authority of so-called "surplus capacity" at Muscle Shoals in the business of operating an electric system in the area.

(14) The court cannot conclude that Tennessee Valley Authority is disposing of a bona fide surplus of electricity actually existing and unavoidably created in the light of the fact that Tennessee Valley Authority is proceeding with construction which will enormously, progressively, and indefinitely add to such surplus, both new and old units being interconnected into a common pool in support of long-term commercial commitments and public-service operations by T. V. A.

(15) Congress cannot, in lieu of taxation, authorize Tennessee Valley Authority to enter into the commercial power business for the purpose of reimbursing the Government for the cost of improvements to navigation, where such commercial business has, as proposed by Tennessee Valley Authority on this record, no relation to any lawful governmental function.

(16) Congress has no lawful power to authorize the Tennessee Valley Authority to subject the United States or any agency of the United States to an actionable obligation to perform a proprietary service for the public generally in north Alabama either by conducting utility operations in the area or to the extent of a commitment for the production of electricity for sale at wholesale or retail where such function, as upon this record, has no relation to any governmental purpose. This conclusion applies to the objectives sought to be accomplished by Tennessee Valley Authority in part by means of the contract of January 4, 1934. Any such authority from Congress would be illegal because without foundation under the Constitution, and it is unnecessary to determine whether such action would be at the same time affirmatively violative of the tenth amendment, void as an infraction of sovereignty or as constituting a delegation and impairment of the legislative discretion of Congress, or invalid by reason of other objectives of Tennessee Valley Authority shown by the record or by reason of electricity policies set out in the Tennessee Valley Authority Act.

(17) The plan and program of the Tennessee Valley Authority, in furtherance and execution of which the Tennessee Valley Authority entered into the contract of January 4, 1934, is a plan and program for the operation by Tennessee Valley Authority of a system for the generation, transmission, and distribution of electricity. Its proposed functions are utility in type. Under its contracts with the various municipalities to be served the service is to endure for at least 20 years, and involves a service which by reasonable implication is permanent in its nature. This purpose, based on the intentional generation of electricity by Tennessee Valley Authority in excess of intended governmental use, and being necessarily withdrawn from that use by its commitment to the utility program, would constitute illegal proprietary operations, and would be and is illegal, whether conducted as a utility or by direct sale by Tennessee Valley Authority either at wholesale or retail and at the dam or after transmission.

(18) The contract of January 4, 1934, expressly provided for the transfer of all or substantially all of the lines and properties of the Alabama Power Co. for the service of the ceded area, included transmission lines, rural distribution systems, and certain urban distribution systems, and contemplated the eventual transfer of 14 urban distribution systems. This contract, expressly contemplating service of the ceded area by the Tennessee Valley Authority with electricity to be generated or purchased by the Tennessee Valley Authority for that purpose, was in furtherance of illegal proprietary operations by the Tennessee Valley Authority in violation of the Federal Constitution and void. The contract was accordingly ultra vires and void as to the Alabama Power Co.

(19) Performance of the contract of January 4, 1934, would involve substantial loss and injury to the Alabama Power Co., including, inter alia, the loss or abandonment of franchises, licenses, going business, and service area supporting its general system and power facilities and unless resisted would tend to invite a progressive encroachment on its service area by the Tennessee Valley Authority.

(20) For the management and the board of directors to yield to the proposal and program of the Tennessee Valley Authority and to execute and go forward with the contract for the transfer of properties in proximate furtherance of its illegal proprietary operations, unnecessarily (because of its illegality) and to the injury of the Alabama Power Co., constituted a breach of duty on part of the board of directors and management of the corporation.

(21) It is not necessary to the foregoing conclusion that the directors or that the Commonwealth & Southern Corporation, its dominant stockholder, should be shown to have acted fraudulently or in bad faith or from evil motives, or that the contract should have been exacted by the Tennessee Valley Authority under circumstances constituting administrative oppression or malevolence (American Bank & Trust Co. v. Federal Reserve Bank, 256 U. S. 350). The breach of duty to the injury of the corporation in not resisting and the action of the management in going forward with an arrangement in furtherance of an illegal objective by the Tennessee Valley Authority, and therefore ultra vires, is remediable at suit of the plaintiffs, although the directors and Commonwealth & Southern may have considered it more desirable to yield to the Tennessee Valley Authority program than to resist and incur the risk and consequences of resistance inherent or threatened.

(22) In this situation the plaintiffs, as holders of preferred stock of the Alabama Power Co., on behalf of themselves and other preferred stockholders, had the right to demand that the Alabama Power Co. refrain from performance of the contract of January 4, 1934, and take such action as might be necessary to protect the corporation in the premises. The stockholders made due demand, and upon refusal of the management and the board of directors to take action, they became vested with the right to maintain this suit for relief.

(23) The conclusion of the court is that plaintiffs are entitled to maintain this suit within the principles laid down in Dodge v. Woolsey (18 How. (59 U. S.) 331), Chicago v. Mills (204 U. S. 321), D. & H. Co. v. Albany, etc., Co. (213 U. S. 435), Ex parte Young (209 U. S. 123), Greenwood v. Un. Fr. R. Co. (15 Otto (105 U. S.) 13), Smyth v. Ames (169 U. S. 466), Pollock v. Farmers Loan & Tr. (157 U. S. 420 (158 U. S. 601)), Cotting v. Goddard (183 U. S. 79), Smith v. Kansas City, etc., Co. (255 U. S. 180), Brushaber v. U. P. R. Co. (240 U. S. 1).

(24) The proof sustains the right of the plaintiffs to have the contract of January 4, 1934, annulled in its entirety as to Alabama Power Co. and for such additional relief as may be necessary or appropriate to give effect to the annulment of the contract and to protect the corporation from the consequences threatened by the contract itself, viz, the loss of business, franchises, and service area to the Tennessee Valley Authority in pressing its illegal proprietary operations in the ceded area directly and through the defendant municipalities or other privies.

(25) The municipal defendants hold or propose to enter into 20-year contracts with the Tennessee Valley Authority for the supply of electricity to said municipalities as soon as they shall obtain municipal distribution systems. The city of Athens already has its system. Such contracts, existing and proposed, give or tend directly to give effect to the aforesaid illegal plan and program of the Tennessee Valley Authority and are and will be in furtherance thereof. In the same category are or will be loans or grants of public funds made or to be made by the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, or other Federal agency to said municipalities in cooperation with Tennessee Valley Authority and with a view to their becoming a market for Tennessee Valley Authority's commercial power business. Said agreements, existing or proposed, between the said municipalities and the Tennessee Valley Authority will directly and necessarily involve competition with and displacement of the Alabama Power Co. from the area served by the facilities and properties required to be transferred or expressly contemplated to be transferred out of the Alabama Power Co. by the contract of January 4, 1934, hereby annulled. All such agreements constituting a means of and in furtherance of said illegal operation and all extensions of its lines, system, and service by Tennessee Valley Authority to give effect to its proposed illegal operations in competition with and to the injury of the Alabama Power Co. in the area of service of the facilities required or contemplated to be subjected to Tennessee Valley Authority service by Tennessee Valley Authority, at wholesale or retail, should accordingly be restrained.

(26) The Electric Home and Farm Authority, Inc., is a proprietary agency of or for the T. V. A. in the promotion of the sale and in the financing of the sale of electric appliances in furtherance of the T. V. A. power policy and program herein defined. The contract between the Alabama Power Co. and Electric Home and Farm Authority, Inc., dated May 21, 1934, was entered into pursuant to a covenant required of the Alabama Power Co. by section 19 of the agreement of January 4, 1934. The plan, program, and objective of said Electric Home and Farm Authority was and is illegal as an agency of and in furtherance of the T. V. A. program and for the further reason that there appears to be no valid authority in or pursuant to any act of the Congress of the United States for the creation or functioning of said E. H. F. A. or its appropriation or use of the funds of the United States. Said agreement is therefore deemed to be proximately related to the contract of January 4, 1934, and also being intrinsically illegal, should be annulled.

This April 11, 1935.

W. I. GRUBB,
United States District Judge.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I desire to offer up at this time an amendment to this bill which I presented on Friday, and asked to have printed and lie on the table. I ask to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to insert, at the proper place in the bill, the following:

That all moneys heretofore or hereafter made available for expenditure in carrying out the purposes of the act of May 18, 1933, known as the "Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933", of whatsoever character, shall be deposited and covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of a fund to be designated the

"Tennessee Valley Authority Fund", and be withdrawn therefrom only pursuant to accountable warrants for advances to the credit of an adequately bonded disbursing officer, as determined by the Comptroller General of the United States, or certificates of settlement issued by the General Accounting Office.

No part of such money shall be used to make payment under any formal or informal contract in excess of $100 hereafter entered into except in case of public emergency requiring immediate action, unless the need be advertised so as to permit of full and free competition, and award made to the lowest responsible bidder offering delivery or performance in accordance with the advertised specifications.

Except in the case of a public emergency requiring immediate action, the facts of which emergency shall be duly entered of record and filed with the contract, no bid shall be accepted until after a lapse of 7 days from the date the bids were opened nor while there is pending a protest filed in writing either with the Tennessee Valley Authority or the Comptroller General of the United States, or any questions otherwise raised and undetermined by the Comptroller General of the United States, involving the corporations procedure, the bidding or effect thereof, or other matters affecting the legality of the proposed obligation, or the availability of the money proposed to be charged.

The Comptroller General is authorized, in his discretion, to allow credit for payments from moneys under the control of the corporation, not otherwise allowable, when shown to be reasonably necessary to the accomplishment of the work authorized by law to be done by the corporation.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, last Friday, when I offered this amendment, I mentioned the fact that about a year ago I offered exactly the same proposal, then in the form of a separate bill. I explained to the Senate last Friday that I did so originally because a constituent of mine, who was a bidder for work which had been advertised by the Tennessee Valley Authority, though the low bidder and a responsible bidder, and bidding on either machinery or materials which were standard and known to be adequate and suitable for the purposes for which they were intended, was not awarded the contract; that the contract was awarded at a higher price to some other bidder. This contractor came to me and asked me why this was so, having understood, as certainly I did, that under the law all contracts on Government work had to be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder.

I took up the matter with the Comptroller General, asking him how it could be that this was done. The Comptroller General told me that in respect to the Tennessee Valley Authority he had no control over such matters as in all other cases; in other words, there was no control beyond what the members of the Board themselves exercised. To put it differently, so far as this particular department or activity of the Government was concerned, they did not come under the full purview, in the sense that I mean it, of the Comptroller General or his department. True, the Comptroller General has the responsibility of making a periodical audit; but that is simply what I might call a statistical-accounting audit, and there is no control beyond that so far as the Comptroller General's department is concerned.

It seemed to me, therefore—and it has seemed to me ever since I became acquainted with the true situation—that there is no reason why this particular activity of the United States Government, which is supported at public expense, should have any preferred, specially privileged status, so far as the purview of the Comptroller General is concerned, over any or all other departments, establishments, or agencies of the Government. There is nothing in my amendment which goes into the activity or purposes of the Tennessee Valley Authority. My amendment confines itself solely to this one phase of this proposition.

I shall not take any of the time of the Senate in discussing, as has been so ably discussed by other Senators, the philosophy and intent which underlies this great, growing undertaking. It is enough to say that it certainly is competition with private industry, which it taxes for its own support. My amendment, however, has nothing at all to do with any of those aspects of T. V. A. It just raises the question as to whether or not I am right in my belief that in this instance the Comptroller General should have the same measure of control that he has in all other Departments or agencies of the Government. I say "all other." I believe, however, as I have said before, that there is one other instance, the Shipping Board, where the purview of the Comptroller General is not so complete as it is in all other instances, excepting only the T. V. A.

But, as I said last Friday, as I understand, the Shipping Board is in the course of liquidation, and the necessity for that control is certainly not as great as it is in this instance, where expansion and growth are contemplated, and wherein the distinguished author of the bill which is before us this afternoon seeks not only to double the capital and, if I read this bill aright, increase the scope and power of the Authority, but to bring into a legalized status, if I may put it in that way, certain present and past activities of the Authority, which it seems to me were not contemplated or permitted in the original act.

However, these things are not what I want to go into. As I have said, I am perfectly sincere in making this suggestion and this suggestion alone, that the T. V. A. Authority be brought, as I have said, and repeat, under the full purview of the Comptroller General, just as is every other activity of its kind. That these particular activities be safeguarded in the public interest as are all other activities supported by the taxpayers' money. For that reason the amendment suggests that such moneys as rest in the Authority be returned to the Treasury of the United States, and hereafter be paid out only on accountable warrants and spent only by duly bonded accountable officers. There are other features which are not as important, but which I think would be very helpful to the safeguarding of the Authority and its undertakings. In other words, to mention one, in certain necessities credit should be extended so as to save time, and in certain small amounts the expenditures could be made without the check and control I seek to exact. And in the case of certain emergencies, exception could also be made as set forth in my amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The other day, during a colloquy I had with the Senator, I understood him to say that the Comptroller General did not have the right to audit the accounts of the T. V. A. Was he not mistaken in that? Does not the Comptroller General have the right to audit the accounts of this subdivision of Government just as it does those of other departments and bureaus?

Mr. BARBOUR. I well remember the question asked by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, and he will recall that I replied to him that I was not sure whether he had in mind the full purpose of the amendment. And I want to say again, as I said last Friday when the Senator spoke to me about the matter, that the Comptroller does have the power of audit. I do not feel, however, that the power of a mere audit is sufficient.

Mr. McKELLAR. I recall that; and when I examined the amendment I found that it apparently had a very different purpose from the one I had thought was behind it. I find also that the Comptroller General does have jurisdiction over the accounting of the Tennessee Valley Authority, and for that reason I have changed my mind entirely with reference to the amendment.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I absolve the Senator from Tennessee of the suggestion he made at the time—that he would vote for the amendment. I understand the position in which he finds himself.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not understand the nature of the amendment.

Mr. BARBOUR. I am quite satisfied that the Senator did not realize it went as far as it is intended to go, and I am sure the Senator will do me the justice to say that I did not try in any way to place him in a false position in this respect.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is absolutely correct about that, of course.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I do not feel that I wish to take any more of the time of the Senate. This is not a new matter. I am not trying in this in any way to obstruct, or to waste time. My hope had been that the Senator from Nebraska, who admittedly knows a great deal more about this whole subject and this activity than I could know, because he has studied it so closely and for so long a time, would be willing either to accept my suggestion or tell me, if I am not asking too much, if he cares to do so, any valid reason why this particular activity of the Government should have this special privilege so far as freedom from the full purview of the Comptroller General is concerned.

I ask the Senator from Nebraska, if I may, whether he looks with any sympathy upon my suggestion.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I expect to speak on the Senator's amendment as soon as I am able to get the floor.

Mr. BARBOUR. Well, Mr. President, under those circumstances, I shall be very glad to yield the floor to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in his closing remarks the Senator asked me whether I had any objection to his amendment. In reply let me state that, in my judgment, if this amendment were adopted, to a very great extent it would nullify all the benefits which can come from the proper administration of the T. V. A. Act. Of course, I concede frankly that the Senator has a perfect right to offer the amendment and to support it in any way he sees fit to do so.

I do not believe there is a thing in the amendment which is not already covered by law, or is not very objectionable. Let me read from the amendment:

Except in the case of a public emergency requiring immediate action, the facts of which emergency shall be duly entered of record and filed with the contract, no bid shall be accepted until after a lapse of 7 days from the date the bids were opened nor while there is pending a protest filed in writing either with the Tennessee Valley Authority or the Comptroller General of the United States, or any questions otherwise raised and undetermined by the Comptroller General of the United States, involving the Corporation's procedure, the bidding or effect thereof, or other matters affecting the legality of the proposed obligation, or the availability of the money proposed to be charged.

Think what that would mean. They could not accept a bid, in the first place, within 7 days after it was opened, and thereafter could never accept a bid so long as there was a protest in writing on file with the Comptroller General or with the T. V. A. It would be disastrous. It would cost the Government of the United States, through this instrumentality, millions of dollars, if that kind of a provision were in the law.

It is simply not understandable to me how anyone who does not want to destroy the Tennessee Valley Act can suggest for a moment that such an amendment should be agreed to, and I doubt whether the Senator from New Jersey himself fully comprehends just the evil that is included in the amendment.

The Comptroller General, under existing law, has full authority to make all audits. That authority is included in subsection (b) of section 9 of the existing Tennessee Valley Act. Let me read it:

(b) The Comptroller General of the United States shall audit the transactions of the Corporation at such times as he shall determine, but not less frequently than once each governmental fiscal year, with personnel of his selection. In such connection he and his representatives shall have free and open access to all papers, books, records, files, accounts, plants, warehouses, offices, and all other things, property and places belonging to or under the control of or used or employed by the Corporation, and shall be afforded full facilities for counting all cash and verifying transactions with and balances in depositaries. He shall make report of each such audit in quadruplicate, 1 copy for the President of the United States, 1 for the chairman of the board, 1 for public inspection at the principal office of the Corporation, and the other to be retained by him for the uses of the Congress. The expenses for each such audit may be paid from moneys advanced therefor by the Corporation, or from any appropriation or appropriations for the General Accounting Office, and appropriations so used shall be reimbursed promptly by the Corporation as billed by the Comptroller General. All such audit expenses shall be charged to operating expenses of the Corporation. The Comptroller General shall make special report to the President of the United States and to the Congress of any transaction or condition found by him to be in conflict with the powers or duties intrusted to the Corporation by law.

The pending amendment, if enacted into law, would make it impossible, except after great delay, for the Corporation to act when there was a simple written protest filed by anybody in the United States; yes, in the world. It might be a protest filed by someone in London or in Japan. There is no question that the Comptroller General and the Corporation would be flooded with protests filed from time to time making it impossible for any bid ever to be accepted.

Mr. BARBOUR. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska if the provision on page 2, in line 20—

No bid shall be accepted until after a lapse of 7 days from the date the bids were opened—should remain in this amendment, and if the phrase which immediately follows—nor while there is pending a protest filed in writing either with the Tennessee Valley Authority or the Comptroller General of the United States—and so forth, were eliminated, would that meet the Senator's approval?

Mr. NORRIS. No, Mr. President. The rest of the amendment is, from my viewpoint, practically as objectionable as what I have pointed out. Let me refer to part of it:

That all moneys heretofore or hereafter made available for expenditure in carrying out the purposes of the act of May 18, 1933, known as the "Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933", of whatsoever character, shall be deposited and covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of a fund to be designated the "Tennessee Valley Authority fund", and be withdrawn therefrom only pursuant to accountable warrants for advances to the credit of an adequately bonded disbursing officer, as determined by the Comptroller General of the United States, or certificates of settlement issued by the General Accounting Office.

That would be absolutely destructive of the conduct of the business of the Corporation. It would nullify several sections of the existing law, where with great care and after great deliberation we finally reached a conclusion as to how the finances of this Corporation should be handled. The law now provides for the handling of these funds. It never has been charged by anyone that one cent of the money ever has been lost on account of default or on account of any criminal act of any official. There has been no such complaint. This amendment, however, would put the money in a special fund, entirely different from the one in which we had it in another case, and handicap and hamstring and repeal about one-fourth of the Tennessee Valley Act.

What is the necessity of doing that? Why put the money in a special fund in the Treasury from which it can be taken out only by a bonded disbursing officer? It is proposed that the moneys "be withdrawn therefrom only pursuant to accountable warrants for advances to the credit of an adequately bonded disbursing officer." That will mean setting up another officer. Does not the law now provide for a treasurer and how the money shall be handled and where it shall be placed? I do not see any objection to the way it is now being handled. I know of no objection that has ever been made so far. Why is it made now? What is the object in changing the procedure at all?

Then there is another part of the amendment:

No part of such moneys shall be used to make payment under any formal or informal contract in excess of $100 hereafter entered into except in case of public emergency requiring immediate action, unless the need be advertised so as to permit of full and free competition, and award made to the lowest responsible bidder offering delivery or performance in accordance with the advertised specifications.

Mr. President, I have on my desk a better analysis than I have made of the amendment prepared by the members of the Board of the Tennessee Valley Authority. Unless further debate brings it all out, I shall not attempt to read it all now, although I ask unanimous consent to include it all as a part of my remarks; but I will read an extract from it showing what would happen. That which I do not read shows the necessity of existing law in carrying out the contracts, opening bids, and letting contracts under the bids.

The Board says:

The requirement that 7 days should elapse between the opening of the bids and the award of a contract, and that no award should be made while a protest is pending before the Comptroller General is entirely unworkable and would cost the Government many thousands of dollars. The Authority could not meet emergencies nor schedule its work. As stated above, the question of determining the lowest responsible bidder is one of experienced engineering judgment of the highest quality. The Authority has such a staff. The Comptroller General does not.

In other words, this amendment turns over the matter of passing on technical questions to the Attorney General, who is not equipped to do it, taking it away from the board which is equipped to handle it.

The Authority knows from experience that the delays in obtaining decisions from the Comptroller General's Office will be considerable and costly.

They make no complaint about that. That follows as a matter of course, because the Comptroller General is one of the hardest-worked officials in the Government of the United States.

The Authority knows from experience that the delays in obtaining decisions from the Comptroller General's Office will be considerable and costly. A few examples might be cited. In each case the equipment involved was of a very special nature, the experience of the successful bidder was a controlling factor, and delay in receiving the equipment or failure in operation would have interrupted the entire construction process and might have been disastrous to life and property.

Here is an example which they give on the Norris Dam:

Protest of award filed with Comptroller General April 27, 1934. T. V. A. award sustained by Comptroller General on July 2, 1934.

From April 27 to July 2 they would have been held up, under this amendment, and nothing would have been done, which might, as they say, have been disastrous, involving in some cases perhaps a million dollars or more.

Here is another example:

Protest of award filed with Comptroller General January 13, 1934. Decision sustained by Comptroller General on April 28, 1934. Delay, 111 days.

When a dam is being built on a river where high water is going to come after a certain period, where the work must be done during low water, where those in charge of the construction are rushing to get something done that cannot be done during high water, what might 111 days' delay mean? It might mean the destruction of millions of dollars' worth of property which otherwise could be saved.

Here is another example:

Protest of award filed with Comptroller General December 20, 1933. Decision sustained by Comptroller General on April 27, 1934. Delay, 129 days.

The proposition need only be stated, it seems to me, to show how foolish it would be to try to amend by such a process as that a law which now is giving perfect satisfaction:

In each case it should be noted the Comptroller General sustained the award made by the Authority.

Here is another instance:

The cableway unit which conveys the concrete to the job is the key to the construction operation. It must last for the life of the job and operate continuously and safely. When it stops the job stops. Taking into consideration the relation of the construction schedule to high-water conditions on the river, waiting for a Comptroller General's decision in this case for over 4 months would have cost the Government a million dollars or more.

So, as I see the amendment, there is nothing in it but destruction and expense, with no good to anybody.

Considering the construction plant at Norris Dam as a whole, the economy of T. V. A. purchasing is illustrated by the fact it has operated at more than 20 percent above its rated capacity. As a result there has been a saving of equipment overhead and the work is 2 months ahead of schedule now.

The provisions of section 3—

They are referring to this amendment—would afford an excellent opportunity for disqualified bidders and other adverse interests working through them constantly to harass the T. V. A. and disrupt its work program.

In requiring advertising for bids for the purpose of full and free competition it is important to note that there must be some exceptions. Occasionally equipment is required which is made by only one manufacturer. No substitute will serve. Occasionally it is in the public interest and economical initially to select single items of equipment as a basis of experience for subsequent large purchases. Particularly in research and demonstration work is the purchase of proprietary articles a necessity. It would appear that the proposed amendment would prohibit such purchases and seriously handicap the work.

Mr. President, I might read the remainder of this statement, but I shall not do so. I do not believe the Chair put the question on my request. I ask unanimous consent that the entire matter be printed in the Record as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

COMMENT ON AMENDMENT PROPOSED BY SENATOR BARBOUR TO S. 2357 (THE NORRIS AMENDMENT TO THE T. V. A. ACT) CONCERNING PURCHASING PRACTICES OF THE T. V. A.

The purchases of the Authority are of great variety and of large volume. Many exceptional and special conditions arise. Large dam-construction projects require new and special equipment. Failure of a single piece of equipment or delay in obtaining equipment or material interrupts the entire process of construction and costs thousands of dollars and possible loss of life. Electricity generation, operation of high-voltage power lines, and the necessity of uninterrupted service similarly require a degree of purchasing flexibility and the freedom to meet emergencies. Further complexity arises out of the wide range of purchases required by an extensive research and demonstration program calling for special equipment and materials.

The Authority now has a certain flexibility of purchasing through which it has been able to meet emergencies, obtain the equipment required, buy economically, and save large sums of Federal money. The procedure used by the Authority is based on the principle of adequate specifications, advertisement of bids, and award to the lowest qualified and responsible bidder. Forms for invitations to bid and contracts are standard Government forms with the caption "United States Government" changed to "Tennessee Valley Authority."

The procedures generally are those of the Navy Department. Many suggestions of the Comptroller General have been adopted. Facilities of the Federal Warehouse in Washington, of the Traffic Bureau of the United States Treasury, and of the Bureau of Standards are used. Close contact is maintained with the Procurement Section of the Treasury and with the code offices of the N. R. A. Standard Government specifications are the basis of T. V. A. specifications.

In accordance with the procedure followed by certain Government departments, the T. V. A. purchasing agent is authorized by the Board to make purchases under $500 without bids where there is an emergency or an economy would be effected by eliminating unnecessary procedures. For all other purchases the practice of the Authority is to require competitive bids. The award is then made to the lowest responsible and qualified bidder with full consideration for all factors mentioned in the specifications and the best interests of the Authority.

Price is only one factor. Time of delivery may be important. A small additional expenditure may result in a quality of product and assured continuity of operation worth many times the small extra cost. In purchasing large special equipment for construction work an outstanding consideration is the experience of the bidder. Great reliance is placed on this factor of experience, and it is so stated in the specifications. A guaranty to meet specifications by an inexperienced bidder may be meaningless when considered in the light of costly interruption of the entire construction process due to the failure of equipment or materials. Only experienced and competent engineers can appraise bids under such construction conditions and assure a maximum of economy of public expenditure. The Authority has such outstanding engineers on its staff and as consultants; in relying on their judgment it is following the best practice of private construction.

The requirement that 7 days should elapse between the opening of the bids and the award of a contract, and that no award should be made while a protest is pending before the Comptroller General, is entirely unworkable and would cost the Government many thousands of dollars. The Authority could not meet emergencies nor schedule its work. As stated above, the question of determining the lowest responsible bidder is one of experienced engineering judgment of the highest quality. The Authority has such a staff. The Comptroller General does not.

The Authority knows from experience that the delays in obtaining decisions from the Comptroller General's Office will be considerable and costly. A few examples might be cited. In each case the equipment involved was of a very special nature, the experience of the successful bidder was a controlling factor, and delay in receiving the equipment or failure in operation would have interrupted the entire construction process and might have been disastrous to life and property:

Hammermills, Norris Dam: Protest of award filed with Comptroller General April 27, 1934. T. V. A. award sustained by Comptroller General on July 2, 1934. Delay, 67 days.

Crushers, Norris Dam: Protest of award filed with Comptroller General January 13, 1934. Decision sustained by Comptroller General on April 28, 1934. Delay, 111 days.

Cableways, Norris Dam: Protest of award filed with Comptroller General December 20, 1933. Decision sustained by Comptroller General on April 27, 1934. Delay, 129 days.

In each case it should be noted the Comptroller General sustained the award made by the Authority.

The cableway unit which conveys the concrete to the job is the key to the construction operation. It must last for the life of the job and operate continuously and safely. When it stops the job stops. Taking into consideration the relation of the construction schedule to high-water conditions on the river, waiting for a Comptroller General's decision in this case for over 4 months would have cost the Government a million dollars or more.

Particularly in research and demonstration work is the purchase of proprietary articles a necessity. It would appear that the proposed amendment would prohibit such purchases and seriously handicap the work.

Mr. NORRIS. It is very illuminating to have this statement. I do not think it is necessary to take up the time of the Senate to argue further against the adoption of such an amendment as that which is proposed.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, of course I am not really surprised, though I had hoped otherwise, that the distinguished Senator from Nebraska should be so opposed to this amendment of mine, which, as I previously stated, I introduced originally as a separate bill in the last session of the Congress, and certainly I am not surprised at all that the members of the Board of the Tennessee Valley Authority should use every means at their command to prevent action which would place them under the full purview and control of the bureau of the Comptroller General.

The fact remains—and I wish to make a record of the fact—that this particular activity of the Government, the Tennessee Valley Authority, either because of its corporate status, which I felt at the time was given it so that it could sue and be sued, or because of the manner in which the act was drawn, though that is only my impression and I cannot prove that Senators meant that the original act should be so construed, has been removed from the full purview of the Comptroller General. Be that all as it may, the fact remains, this particular activity has a preferred status; it is accorded in this respect a special privilege, and entirely aside, as I have previously said, of any other consideration relating to the activity and purposes of the Tennessee Valley Authority, I seek only to bring it under the same control and under the same safeguards which have been provided in the case of all other governmental activities and independent offices.

I am reluctant to speak any longer on the subject for I feel I have fully covered it and explained the obvious necessity of my amendment. I have already spoken two or three times on my amendment, and I am sure that it must be clear to every Senator that those who are particularly interested in this peculiar and unusual activity of the Government are very tenacious in resisting anything that would bring it under the control I have suggested. I do not wish to delay the Senate by asking for a roll call on the amendment, though I should like to have a record vote. I had hoped, as I have said, that some, at least, if not all, of the suggestions embodied in the amendment would be received with better favor than they have been on the part of the distinguished Senator from Nebraska, but I press now for action on the amendment, and I hope that it may be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. AUSTIN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the demand seconded?

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Coolidge	Johnson	O'Mahoney
Ashurst	Copeland	Keyes	Pittman
Austin	Costigan	La Follette	Pope
Bachman	Couzens	Logan	Radcliffe
Bankhead	Dickinson	Loneragan	Robinson
Barbour	Dieterich	Long	Russell
Barkley	Donahey	McAdoo	Schall
Bilbo	Duffy	McCarran	Schwellenbach
Black	Fletcher	McGill	Sheppard
Bone	Frazier	McKellar	Shipstead
Brown	George	Maloney	Steiwer
Bulkley	Gerry	Metcalf	Thomas, Okla.
Bulow	Gore	Minton	Thomas, Utah
Byrd	Guffey	Moore	Townsend
Capper	Hale	Murphy	Truman
Caraway	Harrison	Murray	Tydings
Carey	Hastings	Neely	Wagner
Clark	Hatch	Norris	Wheeler
Connally	Hayden	Nye	White

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. AUSTIN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON (when Mr. McNARY's name was called). The senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] is absent, attending a meeting of the Jefferson Memorial Commission. His pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has been announced. If the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] were present, he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK. As previously announced, I have a pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY]. Being advised that if he were present and voting he would vote as I intend to vote, I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. COPELAND. On this question I have a pair with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. LOGAN. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE] has a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON].

I desire to announce the following Senators are unavoidably detained from the Senate: The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS].

The junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] is detained from the Senate by illness.

The junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] is absent upon a commission of the Senate to the Virgin Islands.

Mr. AUSTIN. I wish to announce that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] has a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS]. I am not advised how either Senator would vote if present.

The result was announced—yeas 56, nays 19, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

EXTENSION OF NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY ACT

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 113) to extend until April 1, 1936, the provision of title I of the National Industrial Recovery Act, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 113) to extend until April 1, 1936, the provisions of title I of the National Industrial Recovery Act, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance without amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I shall not occupy much of the time of the Senate, but shall content myself with a brief explanation of just what the joint resolution proposes to accomplish.

It will be recalled that the Senate directed its Committee on Finance to make a very thorough investigation with reference to the N. R. A. It was stated at that time that the Committee on Finance, in connection with that investigation, should formulate legislation for the continuance or extension of the N. R. A. For more than 7 weeks the Committee on Finance did make a very exhaustive investigation into the administration of the N. R. A., with the view of following through some of the criticisms of the N. R. A. and at the same time formulating new legislation.

Concluding with the investigation, we began the constructive consideration of legislation, and the joint resolution now before us is the outcome of that consideration of the committee and is reported to the Senate by a committee vote of 16 to 4.

The joint resolution is quite different from the original bill which I introduced as the basis for the consideration of legislation, and quite at variance with certain amendments offered by me to that bill. The committee thought it wise, following the suggestion made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], that we should very well get together without prolonged discussion and consideration upon the floor of the Senate if we should leave the N. R. A. as it is today, with two exceptions, and limit its extension until March 1, 1936. After some exchange of views, the committee agreed upon April 1, 1936, as the date of extension, and that date is carried in the pending joint resolution.

There are two exceptions or amendments made to the present law. One is the elimination of codes which affect wholly intrastate commerce. The N. R. A. in the future would be confined to interstate commerce; in other words, businesses which are wholly intrastate commerce are removed from the codes of the N. R. A. That is the first exception.

The other question is the one upon which much discussion has hinged, and which many persons think was the basis of monopolistic practices in certain trades and businesses—the power of price fixing in certain codes. So, the committee, as the second exception, has eliminated all price fixing by the N. R. A. in any of the codes except in mineral natural resources.

It was first suggested that the exception ought to apply to natural resources of all kinds; but it was pointed out that lumber was one of the natural resources, and that it should be eliminated. So, the committee has recommended the joint resolution to the Senate for passage, with the exception as to price fixing applying only to natural mineral resources.

Mr. MCGILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. MCGILL. Did the committee construe section 1, on page 2, to include the production of coal, and so forth?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and I may say to the Senator from Kansas that the coal situation was one of the moving considerations which caused us to make the exception. There has been hardly any division of opinion among all the coal people that the N. R. A. has greatly helped them. I think almost all the captains of that industry, as well as the labor engaged in it, agree that the N. R. A. has been a lifesaver to the coal industry.

Mr. MCGILL. Then, it is the Senator's construction of this section that it includes the production of coal, lead, zinc, and other ores?

Mr. HARRISON. That is the construction of the committee.

Mr. President, coming now to section 3 of the joint resolution, this section provides for the continuation of the existing codes, but provides that in carrying out the changes in the law as to price fixing and intrastate business, the President shall have 30 days following the 15th day of June in which to make the changes, and so forth. The N. R. A. authorities tell us that this is sufficient time in which to make the changes, and that is why the 30-day period was put into the joint resolution.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, a question was raised by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. MCGILL] as to price fixing on coal. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that that applies only to the natural mineral resources as to which prices are now fixed under the codes; so that the natural resources as to which there is no price fixing under the codes are not affected.

Mr. HARRISON. That is true; but there is in the code on coal a price-fixing arrangement.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oil is not affected.

Mr. HARRISON. I think that is about all I desire to say.

Mr. President, I very much hope we can pass this joint resolution speedily. The House, of course, must take it up. I do not know what the House will do. No one can tell. I very much hope they will make few, if any changes in the joint resolution. Some may believe there will be an insistence on extending the life of N. R. A. for 2 years. I desire to say to the Senate and to the N. R. A. authorities that if the House should extend the life of N. R. A. for 2 years after the passage by the Senate of a measure extending its life until April 1, 1936, and if I should be honored by being named as a conferee in the conference between the two Houses, I should agree to nothing, but I should have the measure brought back to the Senate, if my conferees would agree with me, and let the Senate pass upon the question; and I say as much for any other changes that may be made in the joint resolution by the House. If the Senate should pass this joint resolution, and if the House should decide to write a new N. R. A. bill, carrying out some of the suggestions made by certain gentlemen in the N. R. A., if I should have anything to do with the matter as a conferee in the conference between the House and the Senate, I should insist on the measure being brought upon the floor of the Senate and being considered over again as legislation.

In other words, this joint resolution was adopted as the best way out of a very difficult situation. For my part, I believe in the N. R. A. I believe it has done a wonderful work. I believe it has been a means of giving employment to millions of men. I believe the great trade organizations and businesses of the country are for an extension of the N. R. A. I think it would almost cause an economic collapse for the N. R. A. to die on June 16; and I am not unmindful of the fact that there are Senators here, many in number, and a great number of people in the country, who do not agree with the conclusions I have formed with reference to the N. R. A. I can appreciate the fact that if the Senate committee had gone ahead and written a new bill and brought it in here, it would have taken weeks on weeks, perhaps, to pass the measure, if it could be passed at all. June 16 is rapidly approaching. So, as a practical proposition, in my opinion it is much better for us to let the N. R. A. run along until April 1, 1936, with the two exceptions I have stated.

The courts should pass upon certain phases of the subject. There are such cases now pending before the Supreme Court. At the next session of Congress we can then more certainly and clearly write a law which will be upheld by the courts. I hope the present law will be sustained by the court and construed to be constitutional and legal; but if it should find anything wrong, we should then be in a position where we could frame legislation much better than at the present time.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I desire the Record to show, because I am going to vote with the Senator, that I am voting for his joint resolution not to help the N. R. A., but because I think it dehorn and gums it up a little. I just want the Record to show that.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not care what reason the Senator may advance; I am delighted that he is voting with me one time. [Laughter.]

The resolution was the solution of a practical situation that confronted us, and one upon which I think the whole Senate can agree. I desire to give every assurance upon my part, as far as it is within my power, that if the measure is changed in the House and new legislation written, the Senate will have an opportunity to pass upon the new bill. In other words, it will not go into conference and the Senate have no opportunity to pass upon it save as a conference report.

As a note of warning to those gentlemen who are enthusiastically for N. R. A. and who have worked in N. R. A., I desire to say that I hope, if they are doing it, they will desist from trying to bring influence to bear upon the other body to extend the life of N. R. A. for 2 years or to write new legislation, because in so doing they may be in the position of killing the goose that laid the golden egg, and the blame may be on those who are the best friends of N. R. A. for killing it in the end.

So, Mr. President, I hope we can pass this joint resolution this afternoon, and get it upon its way to the House and let them deal with it, and let the uncertainty which exists in the country disappear.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not mind saying that I had a tacit understanding with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] that I should not oppose the joint resolution in its present form; that is, eliminating price fixing and exempting intrastate commerce, and so long as it remains in its present form, with a possible change of expression, to which I shall call attention in a moment.

The Senator from Mississippi has stated that if any change shall be made upon the part of the other body, the joint resolution will be brought back here for our consideration, and we shall not be compelled to deal with it purely as a conference report. That puts the matter, from a parliamentary standpoint, in a condition which is entirely satisfactory to me. In other words, we are to have full parliamentary protection in the event of a change.

Of course, we do not know what the other body will do; but if we are permitted to deal with the matter as an original proposition in case there is a change it is all we can ask for, I assume.

I desire to ask the Senator from Mississippi a question at this point.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, before the Senator asks the question will he yield to me for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. CLARK. As one of the proponents and supporters of the joint resolution, I should like to say that I entirely agree with the Senator from Mississippi as to the basis of the joint resolution, although the Senator from Mississippi and I approach it from essential different angles. He thinks the N. R. A. should be preserved. I think the N. R. A. should be wiped out, although there are certain portions of it which I should be glad to preserve. It seems to me, however, that the joint resolution embodies the only practical procedure for having court determination, and finding out what portions of the N. R. A. can be preserved, and what portions cannot be preserved. So it is necessary to enact some such joint resolution as this in order that Congress may proceed intelligently.

I should like to add to what the Senator from Mississippi has said that so far as I am concerned, as one proponent of the joint resolution, I shall not only oppose the conference report if it extends the N. R. A. for 2 years, but if the other body at the other end of the Capitol shall attempt to extend the joint resolution for 2 years, as one Member of the Senate I shall vote against sending the joint resolution to conference at all, and let nature take its course on the 16th of June.

Mr. BORAH. Of course the joint resolution is a compromise. It does not embody all that I desire, but it is satisfactory, considering all the circumstances with which we have to deal. I would, if it were deemed possible, join in terminating the act, but I feel if we can eliminate price fixing and exempt intrastate commerce we have gone far in that direction. Exemption of intrastate business will remove 80 percent of small businesses from the codes. I agree with the Senator from Missouri; my attitude of mind toward the N. R. A. is that of the Senator from Missouri. But legislation is a practical proposition, and although I do not wish to be placed in a position where I shall vote for the N. R. A., I am content not to oppose the joint resolution.

I desired to ask the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Missouri what significance they place upon the word "wholly" in line 10 of the joint resolution, page 10, where it says "wholly intrastate commerce." Is that intended to mean anything different from "intrastate commerce"?

Mr. HARRISON. The codes of fair competition which apply to those types of business which do a wholly intrastate commerce we thought should be eliminated. Of course, if some business substantially affects interstate commerce, I presume that the Supreme Court in its decisions would hold that it might come under a code and under the law, because that would not be wholly intrastate commerce. I could cite to the Senator many illustrations of businesses which are now under codes which ought to be out of the control of codes.

Mr. BORAH. If it is intrastate commerce, Congress has no control over it, and should not have. I do not understand the significance of the word "wholly." It does not seem to me to be anything but surplusage. Does it add anything to the fact that it is intrastate commerce, or subtract anything from it?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. It would clearly be applicable to a case where an individual or corporation was engaged in intrastate business and interstate business. The Senator certainly would not wish to deny the right to apply a code to a case of that nature.

Mr. BORAH. No, indeed; and in my opinion, if we should say "intrastate commerce", we would confine the matter to intrastate commerce, and anything that was interstate commerce would be excepted. I desire to make it plain that I do not propose to accept a term that would limit the meaning of "intra" as defined by the courts.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suppose the word "wholly" is used in contradistinction to the word "partly", and that it is employed for the purpose of making clear that the intention is not to eliminate from the codes those businesses which are partly engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. BORAH. I take the position, Mr. President, that if a business is interstate Congress has the power to control it. In other words, so far as the jurisdiction of Congress is concerned, there is interstate commerce and there is intrastate commerce, and whenever the line is passed and it is partially interstate commerce, Congress draws to itself the power to control it. When the commerce passes the boundary of the State it is interstate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator will observe that this language applies to the persons who are engaged in commerce, and not to the commerce itself. The language is, "No code of fair competition shall be applicable to any person." "Person", of course, is defined in the measure as not only a natural person but a corporation or an association. The language is, "No code of fair competition shall be applicable to any person whose business is wholly intrastate." So that any person whose business is not wholly intrastate, which, of course, would mean that it was partly intrastate and partly interstate, would not be exempt under this language.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that perfectly; but what I am seeking to ascertain is whether or not the word "wholly" adds anything, in the view of the proponents.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator will permit, I think it does, because it emphasizes the fact that the persons to whom a code is to be applicable are engaged in intrastate commerce exclusively, and not interstate and intrastate.

Mr. BORAH. If that is the interpretation, it is quite objectionable to me. In other words, suppose an individual were engaged in interstate commerce, but suppose he had a business that was wholly intrastate. Because he individually was engaged in interstate commerce, you could not draw to Congress authority over that business which was wholly intrastate commerce.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, if the Senator refers to a man who is in some business that is interstate commerce and in some other business that is intrastate commerce, he could be drawn into the code so far as his intrastate commerce is concerned. But take the case of a wholesale grocer, for instance, one who lives on the State line, and sells groceries in a wholesale way all over the country. He is engaged in interstate commerce, although he may sell some of his products to grocers in the State in which the concern is located.

Mr. BORAH. Clearly that man would be engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true.

Mr. BORAH. And he would be subject to the control of Congress.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. His business is interstate. It would be so held. Whenever a court determines that it is interstate commerce, of course, Congress has control of it, but when it is intrastate commerce Congress has not control of it. But all this is beside the point. I have said in my opinion the word "wholly" neither adds to or subtracts from intrastate, and the word "wholly" should be stricken out in the interest of clarity. If the proponents are to insist that "wholly" has any legal significance, I should urge it be stricken out.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to draw the distinction. If the same person who is engaged in interstate commerce in the grocery business, as I have illustrated, had a coal yard off in some other part of his city which was wholly within the State, and that business were wholly within the State, that would not be brought within the code simply because in the grocery business he was engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. BORAH. That is a more satisfactory explanation. I wish to say that in approving the joint resolution I do not believe that, as a legal proposition, the word "wholly" has any significance whatever. It would have considerable significance as interpreted by some of the administrative forces in the administering of the N. R. A.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. Is it not a fact that, so far as the courts are concerned, they must and will disregard the word "wholly"?

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt about it. I think it will lead to a great many complications when it comes to the administration of the act by some of the executive officers. They will convince a man that if he is raising a product which ultimately gets into interstate commerce he is under the control of Congress. That is not true. I want it understood, so far as my vote is concerned, that I regard the word "wholly" as wholly superfluous. It has not any significance whatever as a legal proposition.

It is true that in the famous "steamboat" case, as it is known, where the doctrine of interstate commerce and intrastate commerce was first announced, the word "completely" was used in the act as distinguishing intrastate commerce. But it has never had any significance; it has never been used as a distinguishing word in determining what was interstate and what was intrastate. The distinction turned upon the question of whether the business was within a State, was being conducted within a State. If it was, it was intrastate. If the business overlapped State boundaries, it was interstate. It cannot be divided.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. We complain frequently against courts because they strike down laws here and there. I have often thought that if we should apply some of the criticisms to our own body, or to Congress, we might find that we could help the courts by not using language which we know adds nothing to the law, gives it no strength, adds nothing to the legality or to the constitutionality of any particular statute.

So far as this proposed act is concerned, I think that the word "wholly" might mislead some administrative officials. It would not mislead any court. If I may be pardoned for using the word, I think it is a sloppy way to legislate. I think that word should not be in the measure.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further, if we strike out the word "wholly" we run the risk of eliminating persons whose business is intrastate although it is not wholly intrastate.

Mr. ASHURST. In my judgment, we run the same risk with the word there.

Mr. BORAH. Let me ask the able Senator from Kentucky a question. Does the Senator from Kentucky claim that by this joint resolution and by this word "wholly" we are in any wise seeking to modify or change any of the laws as laid down by the courts?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; we are not attempting to change the law, but the Senator must keep in mind that this language is made to apply to people and not simply the commerce in which they are engaged; that many organizations may be engaged in both interstate and intrastate business, and if we strike out the word "wholly" we might by implication include institutions a part of whose business is intrastate, but who have some business, even in the same line, which extends beyond State lines.

Mr. BORAH. If we should provide that no code of fair competition shall be applicable to any person whose business is intrastate, we would cover intrastate business, and only that would be eliminated which was intrastate business.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am afraid not; but if we are going to change it, if the word "wholly" is to be eliminated, then it seems to me that the whole paragraph would have to be rewritten so as to make it applicable to the business, so that no code of fair competition should apply to any business which was intrastate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think that is the construction that will be given the statute anyway. It refers to any person whose business is wholly intrastate. Of course, it is the business which we are seeking to regulate.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. From a practical operating point of view, I can see a clear distinction between the measure with the word "wholly" left in and with the word left out. The Senator from Kentucky has pointed out the particular point; that is, when we attempt to regulate the hours of labor and the wages of a concern which is handling both interstate and intrastate commerce, from a practical proposition it is not possible to separate the two. So the committee wrote the word "wholly" in the measure so that a concern that was doing a combination business might come under a code of fair competition, while if it was doing a business wholly intrastate, and there was no combination of the two, it could not come under a code of fair competition.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if that is the construction which is to be placed on this matter I desire to be heard somewhat at length. When I consented to this resolution there was nothing said about the word "wholly." We were to take the terms "interstate" and "intrastate", and that was made perfectly clear at the conference. It is evident that there is intended to legislate a different construction upon the proposition.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWELLENBACH in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is not evident here that we are trying to put over anything on the Senate by the language which we have used.

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not mean that at all. It is simply an unfortunate expression.

Mr. BARKLEY. What we are trying to do is to make it perfectly plain that any man or any institution whose business is exclusively intrastate is not to be eligible for a code even—he cannot even enter into one voluntarily; but we do not want the language so loose that any man who happens to be engaged in intrastate business but has an extensive interstate business also, would be let out, and that is the danger in removing the word "wholly."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we have been dealing with this question of "interstate" and "intrastate" for over 100 years—

Mr. BARKLEY. I know, but we have been dealing with it in a different way from that which applies to these codes under the N. R. A. We have been attempting to regulate commerce by regulating carriers of commerce, and prohibiting or restricting the shipment across State lines of certain types of commerce, but that has been a little bit different from what we have here, where men who are engaged in that commerce are permitted to enter into agreements.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Let me say to the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Kentucky, that as one of those who participated in the negotiations leading up to the introduction of this particular resolution, and also as a member of the Finance Committee and a member of the subcommittee which actually prepared the resolution, I should like to say that I am not in agreement with my friend from Kentucky on the construction placed on this language. Let me say that the statement of the proposition in the intrastate phase rather than in the interstate was done with the particular suggestion and assistance of the Senator from Idaho. In other words he desired to have it stated, and other Senators with whom we had at all consulted, also desired to have it stated as a negation of the interference of codes with intrastate commerce, rather than an authorization for the imposition of codes on interstate commerce.

When the subcommittee met—and I think I violate no confidence in making this statement—the subcommittee being made up of the Senator from Mississippi, the chairman of the full committee, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], and myself, I proposed that the word "wholly", in line 10 on page 2, just before the word "intrastate", be stricken out, having in mind the same distinction and proposition now advanced by the Senator from Idaho. On the other hand, in discussion in the subcommittee this thought occurred to all of us, and I think is an entirely bona fide thought. We have not stated here that codes of fair competition may be imposed as to concerns engaged in interstate commerce. We put it in the negative—that no code of fair competition shall be applicable to any person whose business is wholly intrastate.

Mr. President, I now suggest to the Senator from Idaho, and urge this upon him for his consideration, and I think I speak for the whole subcommittee when I state that this was the consideration which appealed to all of us; if we strike out the word "wholly", which I originally desired to do, we provide that a concern whose business may be both interstate and intrastate, and whose business is 95 or 99 percent interstate, shall not be subjected to a code because they happen, accidentally, to be engaged to a small extent in intrastate business. I am unable to see any other rule of reason if we strike out the word "wholly."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. It will be the same as if the language provided—"No code of fair competition shall be applicable to any person a part of whose business is intrastate." That would be the effect of it.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, if I took that view of it I would agree with the Senator at once, because I have not any desire to accomplish that object.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I am certain he and I are trying to accomplish the same purpose.

Mr. BORAH. I do not have any doubt about it; and I may say that of the entire committee.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, it may be splitting hairs to draw any fine-spun distinction here, but if it is said that no code shall apply to a person whose business is intrastate, then if we take the concern, the imaginary concern referred to by the Senator from Missouri and by myself, which is engaged in both interstate and intrastate—of course its business is intrastate, but it is not all intrastate—

Mr. BORAH. Well, it is not intrastate.

Mr. BARKLEY. And it is not interstate.

Mr. BORAH. It is not intrastate unless it complies with certain rules and definitions and principles which have been announced from time to time by the courts.

Mr. BARKLEY. The business which is intrastate, of course, is not interstate, but the person who is doing that business is engaged in interstate business.

Mr. BORAH. Then we had better get rid of the word "person" and say, "no business." The word "person" would cover a corporation.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. On that point, Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator that if a concern is engaged in intrastate and interstate business in a city such as Pittsburgh, New York, Boston, St. Louis, or Kansas City, where they do both intrastate and interstate business, if the distinction is made that they are coded as interstate, and no code is applicable to the intrastate business of the concern in their interchangeable business, then that imposes an almost impossible administrative function on any code authority whatever.

Mr. BORAH. Let me ask the Senator: Does the Senator understand that this word "wholly" in any way attempts to modify the principles which have been announced by the courts as to what is intrastate?

Mr. CLARK. I will reply to the Senator from Idaho that I do not; and I do not understand that the Congress has the authority in any case whatever by definition of interstate or intrastate commerce, or any sort of commerce, to change the definitions which have been laid down by the Congress from time to time with respect to that.

Mr. BORAH. I would not have been so interested in this word "wholly" had it not been for what seemed to me to be extraordinary constructions of the meaning of interstate commerce which have emanated from certain sources with regard to the N. R. A.

Mr. CLARK. Let me suggest that the Senator from Idaho and I are in entire accord on that proposition. If Mr. Richberg's definition of interstate commerce is correct, then I am a "heathen Chinese."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, with a simple statement for the RECORD I shall not detain the Senate longer with regard to the matter. My view is that the word "wholly" has no effect whatever when it comes to the construction of this statute by the courts. My further view is, however, that the word "wholly" may be used in the administration of it if so desired to the annoyance of people who are engaged in intrastate business.

Definitions have been given us which would lead us to believe that a farmer who was producing hay or corn which might ultimately get into interstate commerce would be regarded by certain people as engaged in interstate commerce.

While I do not think for a moment the courts are going to hold to any such proposition, I can imagine that it may be utilized in the administration of this bill greatly to the annoyance of those who are engaged in intrastate business, because the man who is engaged in intrastate business ordinarily, a small business, is not prepared to contend against these constructions which may be placed upon it by those who are administering it, and it was my hope, and I so expressed myself at the general conference, and at other conferences, that this statute might be made so plain that the small business man engaged in business in the State, and in no sense engaged in interstate commerce, might not be confused or annoyed by constructions and rules and regulations with reference to the conducting of his business, and that is the reason why I have called attention to the word "wholly"; not that I think it makes any difference as to what is intrastate business after it reaches the Court, but it will lead to a great deal of annoyance before it reaches the Court, in my judgment.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I desire to ask the Senator from Idaho a question. I think the question I intended to ask was probably answered in the colloquy which took place in the other part of the Chamber and which I was unable to hear. The provision is that "No code of fair competition shall be applicable to any person * * *." I was wondering whether or not persons are what are to be governed by the code rather than the businesses. In other words an individual might have, as was suggested by the Senator from Kentucky, two entirely independent businesses. He would be regulated according to the intent of the statute in one of those businesses and not regulated as to the other. Yet the phrasing of this clause would bring him within its terms, because his businesses were not wholly intrastate. I was wondering whether or not it might be possible to make these laws applicable in some way to the business which the person is doing rather than to the person.

Mr. BORAH. I had not supposed so. I think the code would have to apply to the business. If A was engaged in a business which was intrastate and engaged in another business which is interstate you could apply the code to the business which was interstate, but you could not apply it to the business which was intrastate. That would be my interpretation of it.

Mr. ADAMS. I understood the Senator from Kentucky to say that this section applied to persons and not to businesses.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was commenting upon objections raised by the Senator from Idaho to the word "wholly", and I mentioned the fact that "person" was used here rather than the word "business." The Senator has the idea that was in my mind when he suggests that when any person or any corporation is engaged in two separate kinds of business, one of which is altogether within a State, the other of which goes over the line and therefore becomes interstate commerce, that person is not excluded by the word "wholly" here, because he is partly engaged in one and partly in the other, and would be subject or eligible, insofar as his interstate business is concerned, but not insofar as his intrastate business is concerned.

Of course, in writing a law we have to keep in mind those who are not engaged in both kinds, but only in one kind. If he is engaged altogether in interstate business, of course, he would be ineligible and the law would apply. If he is engaged exclusively in intrastate business, he would not be eligible and it would not apply. We have to use the word "person" so as to make sure we are not trying to divide a man's business.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose Mr. A were engaged in a business which is intrastate, a business conducted entirely within the State. Suppose Mr. A also has a business which is interstate. I am not speaking of the same business, but he has two businesses, one of which is interstate and the other of which is intrastate. Would his business which is intrastate be excluded?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is right.

Mr. BORAH. His business which is interstate would be subject to the rule, but the fact that he had two businesses, one interstate and one intrastate, would not draw the entire business, both intrastate and interstate, under the code?

Mr. BARKLEY. Not at all.

Mr. CLARK. The reason for not defining the word "person" more specifically is that the term "person" is defined in the original act of which this is an extension. According to the definition in the original act and according to the understanding of the members of the subcommittee and according to the advice of our legislative counsel, it was as the Senator from Idaho stated.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator from Missouri expect that the word "wholly" will give rise to any misunderstanding or annoyance?

Mr. CLARK. If I had thought so, I should not have agreed to keep the word in the joint resolution. My endeavor, as that of other Senators, was to arrive at some composition, if possible, which would enable the matter to be held in abeyance until the Supreme Court of the United States might have an opportunity to determine the issue. I certainly would not knowingly or willingly have agreed to leave any word in the measure which I thought would make trouble in construction in the future.

Mr. BORAH. Is it the Senator's opinion that if the joint resolution becomes a law it would exclude intrastate business from the operation of the codes?

Mr. CLARK. If I did not think so, I certainly would not be in favor of it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I simply want to make a statement to the effect that I intend to vote for the joint resolution, but, like the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], I do not want to be understood as desiring to extend the N. R. A. for a single minute. If I could do so I would terminate it right on the spot, because I have not had anything to do with it, nor have I permitted it to have anything to do with me or my business. I shall vote for the joint resolution as the best thing perhaps that we can get.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] a question. I understood him to say that when the joint resolution comes back from the House, if it is changed in any respect the change will be submitted to the Senate for consideration.

Mr. HARRISON. In view of the fact that we are trying to get together on the joint resolution and get it out of the way so the N. R. A. may be extended and not die on June 16, I think I would be unfair, if I had anything to do with the conference and the House should amend the joint resolution or write a new measure, not to bring it to the Senate and let the Senate pass upon it. I should not agree to anything in conference without first submitting it to the Senate. So far as in my power lies I shall follow that course.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I understood and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] seemed to understand it was to come back here as an original proposition, which would throw the whole matter open for discussion.

Mr. HARRISON. No. What would happen would be this. If the House, for instance, should substitute a new bill for the joint resolution and it should come over here, we could either go to conference or we could submit it to the Finance Committee and its report back to the Senate would bring the whole matter again before the Senate. If I had anything to do with it I should not ask that it go to conference if there was any substantial amendment made to the joint resolution as now before us, but would insist upon permitting the Senate itself to pass upon any changes made, agreeing or disagreeing to them.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the Senator does not intend to preclude any amendment that might be adopted in the House from going to conference if the Senate should be willing to send it to conference?

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, absolutely not.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If the House should add an amendment to the joint resolution as it passed the Senate, and it should come back here and be submitted to the Senate, we can then only consider the amendment made in the House. Is not that true?

Mr. HARRISON. If the House should extend the N. R. A. 2 years and it should come over here in that form, I should feel that the Senate itself ought to consider the proposition whether it should be extended beyond April 1, 1936, or for 2 years.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I should like to ask the Senator a question concerning the exception on page 2 of the joint resolution, paragraph 1. The exception provides that price fixing may be allowed for the regulation of prices under Government control. It says it may include any codes for "mineral natural-resource industries."

Mr. HARRISON. If the prices are now permitted to be fixed or are fixed. If those codes now in operation have no price-fixing provision, then they would not be permitted under the terms of the joint resolution to get up a code that would fix prices.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. But if they have a price-fixing code they can continue?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; if there is a mineral natural-resource business.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Can the Senator give me an outline or enumeration of the industries which would come in that category? Does that include the steel industry?

Mr. HARRISON. I have placed in the RECORD a statement which has been prepared by experts.

Aluminum: Trade practice provisions are suspended.

Bituminous coal: Prices provided by article 6.

Asbestos: Article 8 permits price fixing.

Building granite: No provision.

Copper: Through an Executive order price fixing is permitted. The whole copper industry is for the N. R. A. and appeared before the committee.

Crushed stone: Article 7.

Feldspar, gypsum, lead, limestone, manganese, marble quarrying, mica, and petroleum codes provide for posting the previous 24-hour price.

Quicksilver, soapstone, soft lime rock, salt producing sand-stone, slate, fuller's earth, natural cleft stone—these are the ones where price fixing is permissible under the code and they all come in the natural mineral-resource category.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. We have in the steel code an arrangement that is a modified arrangement of what is called the "Pittsburgh-plus system" of fixing prices. Can that be continued?

Mr. HARRISON. I may say to the Senator that in my opinion there was some very just criticism of the N. R. A. administration. It is useless to go into that; it would take too much time; but they have the authority in the code administration to change these basing points.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I know they have, and to the best of my knowledge it has not been done. It should have been done. They had authority to do it.

Mr. HARRISON. I agree with the Senator that more basing points should have been established. It is my considered opinion, and I have so stated before this time, that 90 percent of the criticism which has been hurled at the N. R. A. could be obviated by certain changes that might be made in the administration of N. R. A.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. As long as they have had the opportunity and the authority to do it, and have not done it, why do we not do it here?

Mr. HARRISON. If we should start in to do that we should have to write new N. R. A. legislation, and we never should get through.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That ought to be done.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I think my friend from Mississippi is clearly in error when he says that the Pittsburgh-plus provisions of the steel code, or any other provisions of the steel code having to do with price fixing, would be saved by this exception. Steel is not a natural commodity, it seems to me, within this exception.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It is a mineral natural resource.

Mr. CLARK. Steel is not a mineral natural resource.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Iron ore is.

Mr. HARRISON. Steel was not included in what I said.

Mr. CLARK. I think everybody will agree that the steel code is clearly outside of this exception.

Mr. COUZENS. Steel is not a mineral resource.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Is it not a natural mineral resource?

Mr. CLARK. It is a derivative of mineral, but it is not a natural mineral resource. I do not think anybody, even Mr. Richberg, would contend that that was true.

Mr. BARKLEY. Any more than tin plate would be.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Then am I to understand that the steel code is eliminated so far as concerns price fixing under the so-called "base-rate system", the system which is a modification of the former Pittsburgh-plus system?

Mr. CLARK. Absolutely.

Mr. HARRISON. I may say to the Senator that the experts of the N. R. A. tell me that steel is not construed as one of the natural mineral resources as to which price fixing might be permitted, and that only through establishing basing points could the price-fixing idea be approached.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Will the basing-point system of price fixing be permitted to continue under the joint resolution?

Mr. HARRISON. Price fixing in the steel industry will not be continued, and is not now in the steel code.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am told that steel does not come in here because it is not a natural mineral resource industry, while aluminum is. Aluminum is made out of ore. So is steel. Why does one come in and not the other?

Mr. CLARK. Steel is an amalgam of iron and certain other things.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. What is aluminium made of?

Mr. CLARK. I am frank to say that I do not understand the process of manufacturing aluminum.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is pure aluminum when it comes out of the ground.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It does not come out of the ground as pure aluminum.

Mr. HARRISON. Aluminum has been suspended, so there is no price-fixing code as to aluminum.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I thought the Senator read that from the list.

Mr. HARRISON. I said that the trade practices alone have been suspended.

Mr. CLARK. If my friend from Minnesota will yield to me for just one further remark, I should like to say that I think it is perfectly clear that the steel code is not included within the exception with regard to natural mineral resources. I should like to say further that so far as I am concerned, I am entirely opposed to the exception as a matter of permanent law.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. So am I.

Mr. CLARK. I am opposed to excepting coal or copper or oil or iron or anything else from the restriction on price fixing; and I desire further to say that I should like very much to have price fixing defined in a more explicit manner than it is defined in this joint resolution. I should like specifically to include the matter of Pittsburgh pluses, the matter of production control, and all the other devices for price fixing which Mr. Richberg and other authorities deny are price fixing. If it were a question of enacting a permanent law or a law to run for a substantial period, I should not be willing to agree to this joint resolution or any other joint resolution which did not make the specific definition of price fixing include all the devices with which we are familiar which have been resorted to for the purpose of price fixing.

I will say to my friend from Minnesota, however, that the purpose of this joint resolution is simply to extend the status quo as far as possible, cutting out the most obvious of the devices developed by the N. R. A., until an opportunity may be afforded for a decision by the Supreme Court of the United States which will tell us what parts of the N. R. A. are constitutional and what parts are not constitutional, so that Congress may proceed intelligently to decide what parts of N. R. A., if any, they desire to continue, and what parts they desire to outlaw by law.

Therefore it seems to me that even those who, like the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Idaho and me, are very bitterly opposed to price fixing in any form, including natural mineral resources as well as any other, and including any device such as Pittsburgh pluses, or production control, or any other device, may very well agree on this proposition for a temporary extension to enable and in a way to force a decision by the Supreme Court of the United States on the issue.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, it is necessary to keep in mind in connection with this exemption the fact that even though a product may be a natural mineral resource, unless there is a present price-fixing code operating on it, it is exempt.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I understand that.

Mr. BARKLEY. While aluminum is included in this list, as a matter of fact, price fixing has been suspended as to aluminum, and it would not apply to any other natural mineral resource unless there is now an active code which authorizes price fixing.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. This applies to natural mineral resources, and that kind of an industry is an industry which takes material which it obtains from natural mineral resources. It includes all natural resources out of which finished products may be made. If it does not include the steel industry, then I am entirely wrong as to what is meant by a natural mineral resource industry. The raw material is a natural resource, and, being mineral, it comes within that category; but it seems to me that when we add "industries" we include the manufacture of products that come from natural mineral resources, and it seems to me that would include steel.

Now, I should like to know if the system of price fixing called the "open-price system" will be permitted to continue under this joint resolution.

Mr. COUZENS. Absolutely.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to the open-price system of price fixing, and to ask if that can be continued under this joint resolution. By that system I mean where a contract is advertised for bids, and the bidders are permitted or are compelled to publish their bids, say, 5 or 10 days before the bids are opened. After that has been done, any bidder is then allowed to amend his bid to meet any other bid; and, as a result, we have unanimity of price just as effectively as though the bidders themselves had gotten together, as they were prohibited from doing under the antitrust act, and agreed upon a price. All they have to do is to have some understanding that the lowest bidder shall bid high enough; then the others can amend their bids, and the bids are identical. I should like to know whether that system can continue under this joint resolution.

Mr. HARRISON. That is one of the very phases upon which the court must pass, and about which there is doubt, and we hope that by the time this joint resolution would expire the court will have passed on it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I do not care what the courts do about it; what I want to know is what we are asked to provide here as something that shall or shall not be done. We said that it should be done. I am not in favor of saying that it shall be continued.

Mr. CLARK. Congress never said it could be done. Congress never said that price fixing was legal. Congress never outlawed price fixing, but it never said it was legal. I agree entirely with my friend from Minnesota that this device which he has described here is price fixing, and I say that if Congress outlaws price fixing, the practice which he has described is outlawed by that action, and I believe that every reasonable court would so hold.

I think it is only fair to say since the question has been raised, that the eminent head of the N. R. A., Mr. Richberg, takes a contrary view on that legal proposition, and holds that nothing is price fixing except where fellows get together and write down a definite schedule of prices, saying, for instance, that 27¼ cents a yard is the price of such and such a fabric. That is Mr. Richberg's definition of price fixing. But I believe that every lawyer in this Chamber who has considered the matter will agree that when we outlaw price fixing we do outlaw the processes which the Senator from Minnesota has described, such as production control, and the other devices for price fixing.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. On page 2 the language is, "No price fixing shall be permitted or sanctioned under the provisions of any code." Then, of course, the exception is made which we have discussed.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. If no price fixing is to "be permitted or sanctioned under the provisions of any code", I do not see how bids could be the same, if this joint resolution were enacted and were administered with the intentment which it carries on its face. Certainly no contractors bidding on building a bridge, or furnishing supplies to the Government, could agree on prices unless there was price fixing, and that is declared outlawed by the joint resolution.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. "Except."

Mr. TYDINGS. Except as to mineral resources. I am not discussing that exception.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is what I am discussing.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am assuming the purchase of automobiles, the building of battleships, the buying of tires, the building of roads, or the construction of buildings, the doing of any of the many things in which contractors are engaged. If the joint resolution were enacted and all the bids which came in were identical in amount, it would be a clear violation of the law, and all the bids ought to be rejected because there could be no price fixing under the law, if I understand the joint resolution correctly.

Mr. COUZENS. The testimony before the Committee on Finance does not indicate that construction. Price posting, the posting of prices, is clearly differentiated from price fixing.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. The whole purpose of the joint resolution, I think the Senator from Michigan will agree, is to get away from the definitions of a lot of things as fixed by Mr. Richberg and other officials of the N. R. A., and to get court definitions of the same terms.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I am not in disagreement with the Senator, as has been shown by the fact that I was the first one on the committee to support his position. But I do say that all of the witnesses—and I sat there week after week—contended that the posting of prices was not price fixing, and I do not interpret price posting as price fixing.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I, with the consent of the Senator from Minnesota, ask the Senator from Michigan a question?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. As I understand what the Senator has in mind, it is a situation like this, and I think it is more prevalent in the automobile industry than perhaps in any other. Suppose there were in Washington three dealers in Ford automobiles. The Ford Co. sells its car to the dealer with the understanding that he will sell it to the public at an established price. Is that correct?

Mr. COUZENS. That is my understanding.

Mr. TYDINGS. It is my understanding also. Therefore, that being the case, price posting would be an act on the part of those dealers to sell that car to the Government at the price at which they have agreed to sell it to an individual, in accordance with their agreement with the manufacturer. That would be price posting. Price fixing, as I understand it, would be making a price on something that is not in existence.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator overlooks the fact that there is a very great deal of difference between selling an article at a price quoted, or a fixed price, and selling a lot of stationery, like envelopes, or bulk goods, when one would go to a place, to an institute of some kind, and say, "I post up on the wall that I will sell these envelopes at a dollar a thousand", and everybody else comes along and does likewise. That is price quoting, but there is no price fixing, because there is no agreement. In other words, anyone else who desires to break that price may do so, but he obviously gets in bad with his associates in the code.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. He will be penalized under the code if he does it.

Mr. TYDINGS. One of the things I attempted to point out was in the realm of fair trade practice without price fixing and another was naked price fixing. I am wondering whether any language was devised or presented to the committee which would give the Senate an opportunity to vote against price fixing and at the same time would favor a code of fair trade practices.

For instance, let us suppose there are three automobile dealers in Baltimore—and this case frequently comes to mind—all selling the same car. A man takes a car that is 5 years old to one of the dealers and asks at what price he can turn that car in on a new one. As I understand it, cars of a certain year bring a certain price. Instead of adhering to the code price for that traded-in car, one dealer will cut the price as an inducement against another dealer, we will assume.

I am not in favor of price fixing, but I do think there is a twilight zone where, if the words could be found, there could be a code of fair trade practices evolved which would not involve price fixing. I admit it is a very twilight zone, and I could not suggest the words to go into the measure, but I would not be opposed to that sort of a thing if it could be concisely and emphatically expressed.

I am absolutely in favor of what the Senator from Minnesota and what the Senator from Missouri have said as being opposed to any policy of price fixing.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The question of price fixing has been one of the most difficult problems with which the N. R. A. has had to deal. My conception of price fixing, of course, is not simply the picture of half a dozen men or companies engaged in the same business fixing their own prices and posting them in a public place. That is not price fixing. Price fixing as I have always understood it, and to which there has been objection, has been a concurrence or agreement among all the different competitors in a business to fix the same prices to the public for their products.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is just what happens in this open posting of prices.

Mr. BARKLEY. A situation arose, which I think we all have to acknowledge, that in the codes which limited hours of labor in industry and undertook to provide for an increase of wages it was recognized that if all of an industry should be subject to a code which increased wages and reduced hours of labor, no one of them ought to be allowed to sell its product below the cost of production, so as to be able to injure the others who were regulated by the same hours and the same wages. In that case there was a "floor", as it was called, a minimum below which they could not sell, and that minimum was represented by the cost of production. But this joint resolution even eliminates that. It takes out the "floor." It would permit anyone who wanted to do so, who was under a code, to sell at a price below the cost of production without any restriction, if he saw fit to do so.

I myself felt, and still feel, that in any permanent or long-time extension of the N. R. A. there ought to be some way of guaranteeing that competitors who are under the same restrictions as to hours and wages ought not to be allowed to cut prices. That is one of the things that was extensively indulged in in this country long before the N. R. A. Ever since I have been a Member of Congress bills have been pending in both Houses undertaking to make it impossible for large concerns to go into a community and undersell all their competitors until they had driven them out of business, and then get the whole market for themselves.

There is no "floor" provided in this joint resolution, no minimum; and therefore price fixing would be completely eliminated, save in the limited instances referred to in the exception.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If the Senator from Michigan is correct in his statement that all of the testimony before the Finance Committee indicated that what he calls "price posting" is not price fixing—it may not be price fixing, but the result is that it does fix prices on an identical basis.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, there would be no illegal price fixing unless they had entered into an agreement prior to that posting. But if all of them post the same prices without any previous agreement or understanding, and even if one of them did it first and the rest of them come along, hoping to be able to get some of the business at the same price and post at the same price, that would not be illegal price fixing; that would not be against the law.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I want to make that illegal price-fixing and prohibit it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know how you can ever prevent one man from coming in without any collusion and fixing or posting the same price that somebody else has made or was posting.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. You can do it by secret bids.

Mr. BORAH. When you do it by secret bids you are within the price-fixing principle.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I mean by competitive bids.

Mr. BORAH. If it results in a tacit understanding, express or implied, and they arrive at a final conclusion and they use one price it is price fixing.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Of course. We had the same system in the steel industry. They were prohibited by law from agreeing on prices and fixing prices. How did they get around it? They evaded the law by attending the Gary dinners, and all that was necessary to fix the price was to have someone at that dinner representing the United States Steel Corporation say, "for the next 30 days we are going to sell steel at $30 a ton", for instance. There was no agreement, but everyone who left the dinner knew what the price of steel was and what they would sell the steel for within 30 days.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. As I understand the price-fixing proposition, that was the case before the N. R. A. came into existence. Under this resolution we would be in the same position as before N. R. A. was adopted?

Am I right?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. It says there shall be no price posting. If price posting amounts to price fixing it goes out.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Except as to certain industries.

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course, with the exception. But we are in the same position if this resolution is adopted, outside of the exception which the Senator has made, as we were in before the N. R. A. was adopted.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I think that is true. I am trying to find out what is included in this category under exceptions, and I am particularly interested in knowing whether or not the steel industry is included in this exception.

I am told that it is not.

Mr. BORAH. That the steel industry is not included?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is what I understand.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, that the price fixing in the steel industry would be prohibited under this resolution.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment. I ask the attention of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and suggest that the Senator from Idaho repeat his statement.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand, under this resolution, no price fixing would be permitted, with certain exceptions; that the price fixing in the steel industry would be prohibited.

Mr. HARRISON. Absolutely.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I thank the Senator for that information.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. So long as we are on this subject of price fixing, I wanted to inquire whether the Senator from Minnesota knows, or whether the Senator in charge of the bill knows, the answer to the question I am about to ask. When we had up for consideration the National Recovery Act 2 years ago one of the things we were concerned about, and which we wanted to prohibit, was particularly a practice which many of the large chain stores and concerns indulged in, of disposing of the little competitor by selling a certain commodity, which the smaller store in that neighborhood was selling, below the cost of production. After the little fellow, who, of course, was not able to continue competition under those circumstances, was disposed of, then the price of the particular commodity would be raised again to where the chain store would secure a profit.

There has been pending in the Senate a bill proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Nye], which has been pending for several years, which made an effort to cure that very thing; and we proposed to cure it, or attempted to cure it, in the National Recovery Act by permitting the code to prohibit a sale below the cost of production. Under the provision in this pending bill that power is wiped out, and hereafter that sort of a practice, which really disposed of the little fellow, is not permitted. Whatever might be said of the administration of the N. R. A., that provision has saved many of these little fellows around the country by prohibiting such type of unfair competition.

Now, that is being wiped out. You are prohibiting hereafter any provision being in any code preventing the sale below the cost of production. I should like to get the advice of the Senators in charge of this bill. I think under this provision you are prevented from fixing the minimum wage, because as I interpret it, and particularly under the strict interpretations which are made by the courts, which are not always in sympathy with all progressive movements—under their construction it may be held, and perhaps it will be held, that fixing a minimum wage is fixing a price of labor. I admit it is a debatable question. But should we take that chance of possibly preventing or prohibiting the fixing of a minimum wage?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I will say to the Senator that if you can fix the minimum wage by law it seems to me that you naturally have the right to fix the maximum wage by law. And that may be a very dangerous experiment.

Mr. WAGNER. I think it is a debatable question. I do not say we cannot.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, this resolution does not attempt to fix wages, either minimum or maximum. Under this resolution and under the N. R. A. minimum wages are provided for in the codes, but nowhere has that minimum wage, whatever it may have been, been regarded as price fixing in the sense that it fixes the price of the product turned out by a producer.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Except so far as it entered into the cost of the production.

Mr. BARKLEY. Except insofar as it enters into the cost of production. In that case it only prohibited a sale below the cost of production in order that all competitors might be on an equal basis. All of them having the same wage and the same hours of labor, there was a minimum below which they could not go, and that minimum was the actual cost of the thing being sold. I do not think that any court would hold that price fixing applied to the wages of labor.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me that there is a clear distinction between fixing the minimum wages and price fixing.

Mr. WAGNER. Except the language is "no price fixing shall be permitted or sanctioned under the provisions of any code." I think it is a rather debatable question. It could be easily enough clarified if it is not intended to do that. I mean I am raising the question so that we may understand what is the pleasure of Congress.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I want to say that this language is merely in my opinion a sort of a guidance as to what the N. R. A. will permit in the future.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. A guidance to whom? To Mr. Richberg?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; and to the N. R. A.

To the N. R. A. In effect the mere use of that language without any control over production means nothing. It did not mean anything in fact before we had N. R. A. Everyone that was wise to industry and commerce knew that there was price fixing going on, and always has been price fixing, so that the adoption of N. R. A. has not extended to any great extent price fixing. What has happened has brought price fixing out in the open, where, by congressional enactment, you can stop it if you want to, but you certainly cannot stop it by this mere resolution.

So far as I am concerned, and as a member of the Finance Committee, when I approved of this resolution it was for the purpose of serving notice on code authorities and on N. R. A. that that was what Congress intended to eventually prohibit. I do not expect that we are going to prohibit it in the next 10 months, since most of these codes are in effect now, because when you take away one device for fixing prices they will soon find another device for accomplishing the same purpose.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator may be perfectly right. There may have been price fixing before we had these codes and the N. R. A. I know that a pair of overalls, which sold for 75 cents under former conditions, immediately after the adoption of the N. R. A. the farmer paid $1.50 for those overalls, and coal in the State of Minnesota, which under the system of price fixing was sold at a certain price, was raised from $1.50 to $2 a ton. I prefer, if there was price fixing before, to have that kind.

Mr. COUZENS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. It seems to me the Senator overlooks the fact that when his constituents got coal at the low prices they did, and when a man got overalls at the price he did, no consideration was given to the condition of labor which produced the coal or the overalls, and by the establishment of codes it is admittedly a fact that the wages in many cases were raised; the condition of the coal operators and the coal miners was improved and the wages were raised.

We cannot get away from the philosophy that if we are going to pay men, women, and children a decent and adequate wage the consumers have got to pay the price. We cannot harmonize the buyers and sellers so they will both be satisfied all the time.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I agree with the Senator entirely, except as to his premise. The price of coal has practically doubled in the last 15 years. We used to buy hard coal out in my State for $10 or $11 a ton. Now we pay $19 or $20. No Senator need try to tell me that that is due to the high cost of labor or that labor got its proportionate increase in wages as compared with the increase in the price of coal.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRUMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is no code which applies to the anthracite-coal industry. They are not operating under a code, either as to wages or anything else.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It came in under the general proposition of raising prices. I happened to take coal as an illustration. It is true with reference to the price of everything else. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] seems to think that the $1.50 or $2 a ton increase was due to the high price of labor or increase in the wage scale. For 10 or 15 years the price of coal has gradually gone up, and I venture to say the coal miner did not fare any better with coal selling at $18 a ton than he did when coal was selling for $10 or $11.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. That was done by price fixing before N. R. A. These things did not all happen since N. R. A. As the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] pointed out, there is no code for the anthracite-coal industry.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Let us take the price of steel, for instance, which in many instances increased as much as 800 percent.

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; and it was always fixed before we had N. R. A. For years under a Republican Department of Justice I tried to have the price of rails to the railroads lowered, and yet with all the antitrust laws on the statute books the price of rails continued to the railroads at $44 a ton.

It is perfect nonsense to say that a code of the N. R. A. has been responsible for all of the price fixing. It has nothing to do with anthracite coal. It may have had something to do with steel; I do not know. What I am anxious about is to have the price-fixing combination come out in the open and not have to be dealt with in secret as they have been heretofore. It happens now that all the codes are public property, the hearings are public property, we know what is in the various codes, we know the agreements, and when we get around to it I hope we shall enact a law to stop it all.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That is what I want to do. Let us stop it all.

Mr. COUZENS. We cannot stop it inside of 10 months unless we know our constitutional jurisdiction with respect to wages, hours of labor, and interstate commerce.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. With respect to steel, I think it ought to be stated that the only price-fixing arrangement under the code with which I am familiar is the basing-point arrangement by which, instead of having one Pittsburgh-plus situation, there were numerous situations over the country indicated as basing points. That was a concession to the consumer under the N. R. A. It enlarged the number and extended them so that instead of having one point of distribution from which freight should be charged, whether it was ever distributed from that point or not, there were numerous points throughout the country. That may have been objectionable. It may be objectionable to have any arrangement of that sort, but it did operate as a concession to the consumer as compared to the situation which existed prior to N. R. A.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. I cannot agree with the construction placed on this matter by the Senator from Kentucky. As a matter of fact, the old custom of Pittsburgh plus has been outlawed for a long period of years by the Supreme Court of the United States. I cannot agree that is a boon to the consumer. For instance, a man wants to put in a hardwood floor at Springfield, Mo. He goes to the door of the factory at Springfield, Mo., which furnishes material for hardwood floors, and has to pay freight from some point in Tennessee or Louisiana. I cannot agree that it is a boon to the consumer in St. Louis who desires to use some steel fabrication, when we have steel plants in the city of St. Louis, to have to pay freight from Chicago or Pittsburgh.

I want to reserve my exception to the statement made by my friend from Kentucky. I say the Pittsburgh-plus system has been outlawed under the antitrust laws for years before the N. R. A. came into existence, and it has been rehabilitated and reestablished under N. R. A., and is one of the things I think ought to be wiped out forever.

Mr. BARKLEY. While it is true that the courts have outlawed the Pittsburgh-plus situation, there had been, prior to N. R. A., basing points established throughout the country that were increased in number under N. R. A. It is a matter of difference of opinion as to whether the increase in the number of basing points, so they would be closer to the consumers than before, was a benefit to the consumer or not. I think it was a benefit to that extent.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That was not the only method used to increase the price of steel. For instance, the user of steel would buy 700 pounds or 1,200 pounds. He had been paying 10 cents a pound up to 1,000 pounds. Then the system of fixing prices was changed and he was charged 15 cents a pound up to 200 pounds. If he took 400 pounds, he got it for 12 cents a pound. If he took 700 pounds, he got it for 11 cents a pound. If he took a thousand pounds, he got it for 10 cents a pound. Under that system they raised the price of steel as much as 800 percent. What I am trying to find out is whether this is going to be allowed to continue under the joint resolution.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] said this is only a clarifying resolution. I asked him if it was to help the understanding of Mr. Richberg, and he said it was. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] said that when we passed the original N. R. A. Act we prohibited price fixing.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I said that the N. R. A. original act failed to specifically exclude price fixing. It was stated in committee and stated on the floor that the act did not authorize price fixing. However, it was not specifically excluded, and it has been the sedulous and very successful effort of N. R. A. authorities to keep from having any price-fixing problems passed on to the Supreme Court during the period in which it has been in existence. The joint resolution now before us is specifically to outlaw price fixing.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I misunderstood the Senator from Missouri, and I apologize. He said the N. R. A. Act did not specifically authorize price fixing.

Mr. CLARK. Nor did it outlaw it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes; but Mr. Richberg has said it permits it, because it fixes prices and tolerates the fixing of steel prices.

I understand that the same process of price fixing is prevalent in the sugar industry. I am told that the sugar refineries in Western States like Montana and Utah charge the same price for sugar that is charged in New York, and the price is based upon the price in New York plus freight from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. In defense of the National Recovery Act, I should like to say that if any price fixing is permitted—and I have no such information—which in any way results in a monopoly or in a monopolistic practice, it is a violation of the present National Recovery Act. Therefore, if that type of price fixing was permitted by any administrator, it was in violation of the law.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I believe I heard the Senator from New York state on this floor that in his opinion the anti-trust laws were suspended. If the Senator was correct in that respect, I do not see how monopoly or monopolistic price fixing could be prohibited.

Mr. WAGNER. Oh, no; I never said that.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Price fixing will not do any good unless there is a monopoly. Without a monopoly the price cannot be maintained.

Mr. WAGNER. I am sure the Senator from Minnesota will not find anywhere that I made any such statement as he attributes to me. What I did say was that under the National Recovery Act, to the extent that provisions in a code were in conflict with the antitrust laws, the antitrust laws were suspended, except, as the act itself says, that no code could permit any practice which was a monopolistic practice. So there is a clear prohibition in the law itself against the creation of a monopoly or indulging in or permitting a monopolistic practice.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Then under this joint resolution, as I understand, with few exceptions, the intention is to ride along until we find out what the Supreme Court of the United States says about the original N. R. A. Act.

Mr. HARRISON. That is true.

Mr. WAGNER. I may say to the Senator, if he directs his question to me, that there are other practices which I think we all now agree are desirable which were not permitted under the antitrust laws, such as an association for the purpose of exchanging economic information or agreeing upon certain practices which are vicious or wasteful or economically unsound. Even that kind of a meeting is not permitted under the antitrust laws, and the Supreme Court of the United States has so declared.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Without intending to cast any reflection at all on anyone who does not agree with me—I have never attempted to do so since I came to the Senate and I have never done so knowingly—I desire to say that the more I see of this general language in legislation, handing a kind of bushel basket over to someone else and not only giving him authority to say what legislation means but also giving him authority to say things which are not in the legislation, or which can be found there only by the most extreme exercise of the imagination, the less I like it. Under that system we might as well start out at the beginning of a session of Congress and pass a general resolution covering the whole session and say, "We tender to this department or that department or the other department our good wishes, and delegate to them our judgment, and expect them to pull us out of the depression and save the country, because we do not know what it is all about", and then adjourn.

I say that without meaning to be facetious and without any intention to indulge in levity. We have been discussing an act passed by the Congress in such general terms that we have to go to Mr. Richberg, whom I respect, to find out what it means. There are things about it which we do not like, but which we cannot remove because we have to wait upon the Supreme Court of the United States to tell us what we can do. I am so old-fashioned that I do not see just where we are drifting. My ideas are so old-fashioned that many people think they are new. I cannot help protesting against this general legislation.

I have always felt that to all intents and purposes section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act has been emasculated. I believe the original N. R. A. should have contained what is now contained in the so-called "Wagner labor-disputes bill."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, just as soon as this joint resolution is out of the way, the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] is going to move to take up that bill, which will have full discussion.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes; I understand so. I desire to make my position clear because I feel that if we are going to have one, we ought to have the other. In my opinion, with all due respect to those who disagree with me, the N. R. A. is a monstrosity and has been a monstrosity without some provision for labor such as is found in the Wagner labor-disputes bill.

I hesitate very much to vote for this joint resolution without the Wagner bill as an amendment. In fact, I do not intend to vote for it. I wanted the Senator from New York to offer it as an amendment to this joint resolution, and carry the two measures along together, because one is a complement to the other. N. R. A. is a monstrosity without the other, and they should pass through the channels of legislation together and as one act. I defer to the Senator from New York in the matter, however, because he is the author of the other bill, and he prefers to have it go through as a separate measure. What I fear is that we shall continue N. R. A., and the Senator's labor-disputes bill will be defeated.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, if that shall be done, the whole Congress will be breaking faith with the American worker, and I cannot believe Congress will do such a thing.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It will not be the first time.

Mr. WAGNER. This is a different Congress.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I do not intend to delay the Senate any longer. I did not make these remarks to postpone a vote. In order to save time I ask permission to have printed as a part of my remarks a statement which I made the other evening over the radio in regard to the N. R. A. and the Wagner labor-disputes bill, together with some remarks on an unrelated subject, but one which was included in the same statement, a few paragraphs on the payment of the bonus.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SPEECH GIVEN BY SENATOR HENRIK SHIPSTEAD, OF MINNESOTA, OVER RADIO STATION WEVD, NEW YORK, ON MAY 10, 1935, FROM 9:15 TO 9:30 P. M., E. S. T.

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, I am pleased to accept the invitation of radio station WEVD to address you this evening. I will speak about some problems that are for the moment confronting the Senate—the N. R. A. and the payment of the bonus.

The N. R. A. law provided that unless the Congress extended its life beyond June 16 of this year the N. R. A. would cease to exist. There is strong opposition to its continuation and those who want it continued for another year demand that it be changed to some extent.

Complaints against the N. R. A. have been voiced with a great deal of justification in that because of the suspension of the anti-trust laws it permitted monopoly price fixing, and as a result retail prices were raised higher than there was purchasing power to consume unless the Government furnished the money to buyers to buy goods at these high prices. This the Government has done by taking money out of the Treasury for public works and for relief.

Complaint has also been made that the N. R. A. has favored big industries to the disadvantage of labor, because under its provisions the hours of labor were reduced and as a result where labor was paid by the hour its weekly or monthly pay check was also reduced. Of course, what the average workingman wants to know is, what amount of money does he have at the end of the week or month with which to support his family. That is the most important thing for him. Under the N. R. A. how has the workingman fared, for instance, in the paper industry, one of the most important industries in this country?

According to the code authority figures the average workingman in that industry in the northern zone in 1929, being paid by the hour, had an income of $125 a month. In 1934, working under the N. R. A., he had an income of $60 a month. The code administrator explained that there were two reasons for the drop in his monthly check from $125 to $60; one was that in 1929 the industry was working 75 percent of capacity, while in the spring of 1934 it was working only 50 percent of capacity. He said that as production increased the workman would put in more hours and thus increase his monthly income. The question then became important as to how much he could make if production increased to 100 percent of capacity and he could work as many hours as allowed under the code. It was then discovered that, the hourly wage remaining the same, the most he could possibly make under the N. R. A. would be a few cents over $90. So you see the best he could do under the N. R. A. would be to receive at the end of a month $90 instead of $125, as in 1929.

The answer is made that we have put more men to work and have given men an income now who did not have any before the N. R. A. Now the question is how was that accomplished? It is done in this way. For instance, we will say, I have no work and you who are listening to me have a job, so we cut down your working time and income in order that I shall have a job and income. We make you divide your job and your income with me. Together we have no more purchasing power than you had alone before this arrangement was made for me. That is distributing poverty and misery and not wealth, and I call that making the poor support the poor.

Now what did the N. R. A. do for the paper industry so far as invested capital is concerned? It prohibited the industry from selling below cost of production, and it permitted an agreement on prices; therefore, in contracts for paper to the Government of the United States, of which I have personal knowledge, the prices were from 10 to 40 percent higher in 1934 than in 1929. Now, what this all amounts to is that in that industry, no matter what the rate of production, the price must reflect the cost, and the capital invested is, therefore, protected from loss while the workman is reduced in income to give a job to a fellow workman.

While this applies to the paper industry it does not apply to the wood-pulp industry, which is suffering from competition from foreign importations due to the political influence of certain newspapers which obtain their supply from foreign countries.

In my opinion, if the N. R. A. is to be extended for another year it ought to have attached to it the Wagner labor-disputes bill in order to give labor some chance to bargain with capital for a better deal than they have had under the N. R. A. heretofore. Unless this is done there will probably be temporary recovery for big business for a time followed by another crash as bad as or worse than we had in 1929.

The N. R. A., with the exception of the prohibition of child labor, minimum hours of work, and minimum wages, provisions which we can have without any other part of the N. R. A., has so far been largely a continuation of industrial and labor policies that preceded its enactment.

The exception has been that in some respects the policy proved more vicious toward labor and the small manufacturer and merchant than that pursued before. The hundreds of millions of dollars spent by the Government to feed the unemployed and the needy has obscured the vision of this fact. What the Congress will do to remove the evils resulting from these practices only time can tell. We hope for the best.

The other problem immediately confronting the Senate is the question of the payment of the soldiers' bonus. An overwhelming majority of the Senate are in favor of paying the bonus now. However, there is a disagreement as to how the bonus shall be paid. Some Senators favor the issuing of bonds, selling them to the banks, paying interest to the banks, and then having the banks take the bonds to the Treasury to have the money printed with which to pay the bonus. The majority of the Senators who voted for the Patman bill, which provides that the Government itself shall issue the money direct to those who own bonus certificates, take the position that instead of the Government printing money for banks, the Government should print the money and pay it direct to the veterans.

The amount to be paid in both cases is about $2,200,000,000. If we issue bonds and borrow the money printed by the Government from the banks, we will pay interest on the bonds in 20 years in the amount of something like $1,300,000,000, and the $2,200,000,000 in bond issues will still be unpaid. Consequently, by the bond-issue method of payment the bonus will cost the taxpayers approximately $3,500,000,000. On the other hand, if we issue the currency direct it will cost us only $2,200,000,000.

Those who want to pay $3,500,000,000 say that if you pay $2,200,000,000 that is inflation; and, on the other hand, they say that if we issue bonds and charge the taxpayer $3,500,000,000 that is not inflation. They say that the issuance of currency direct instead of against bonds threatens the credit of the Government of the United States, while the issuance of bonds, resulting in the consequent increased obligations, will protect the Government credit. There is nothing back of the bonds or the currency except the credit of the Government. To me it seems that the cheaper method would do more to protect the Government's credit than the bond method, because at the end of 20 years the obligations of the bond method would cost us $1,300,000,000 more.

The bonus is a contract that the Government made with the veterans in 1924. It is due in 1945. The House of Representatives believes it would have a good effect on our economic situation and hurry along recovery to pay it now. The Senate is of the same opinion as expressed by its vote. The bill is in the hands of the President for his approval or veto.

In my opinion if $2,200,000,000 is now paid to discharge this contract of debt by the Government, this money will go into every nook and corner of the country where people live. It will pay from eight to ten billion dollars' worth of private obligations; it will relieve the Government from expending vast sums for relief. This money will, if prudently expended by those who receive it, carry many families through the hardships of next winter and will furnish purchasing power to the great mass of the people who have no purchasing power now. The payment of this bonus should make it possible to remove several million people from the relief rolls.

In 1797 the Bank of England could not redeem its currency and appealed to the Privy Council of England for help until Parliament could give it relief, and for 23 years England fought the Napoleonic wars with nonredeemable paper currency. Britain prospered as never before with what some people call fiat money, and when England adopted the gold standard and put gold behind its currency in 1820 there resulted a depression the like of which had never been seen in English history, and can only be compared somewhat to the depression we have gone through in the last 5 years. If currency without metallic backing was good enough for England to go through 23 years of war and win it, while at the same time remaining prosperous, that money is good enough for us with which to pay the bonus and fight the depression, because it has back of it the credit of the United States, and it is the same kind of money that many of you have in your pocket as you sit listening to me. I thank you.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] a question.

As I understand, the Senator from Mississippi is committed to the proposition of keeping this joint resolution to the terms specified in it.

Mr. HARRISON. That is my hope.

Mr. BORAH. And in case the matter shall be brought back to the Senate, that will still be the program?

Mr. HARRISON. That is my hope and, so far as I am concerned, I want the Senate to pass on the proposition.

Mr. BORAH. I know the Senate will pass on it, but I want to know whether the Senator feels that that is the program which he will support through the legislative process.

Mr. HARRISON. If this matter should go to the House and they should change the word "wholly", it might be that, in the interest of getting something done, getting this legislation out of the way, I might have to agree to eliminate that word, and I might vote somewhat differently from the way I am voting now. I hope the joint resolution can remain intact as it is.

Mr. BORAH. I have just been informed that it is the program of the House to change the joint resolution by the simple insertion of 2 years instead of 10 months.

Mr. HARRISON. If it does that, the matter will be brought back to the Senate and the Senate will vote on it, and, so far as I am concerned, I am going to vote against a 2-year extension in view of the action of the Senate.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I shall say only a few words, as the hour is late, but I desire to make my position clear on the pending joint resolution.

From statements which have appeared in the press it would seem as if all the members of the Committee on Finance who voted to report the joint resolution were not in favor of the continuation of the N. R. A. That was not the case. In my own instance, I voted to report the joint resolution because I felt that it was the only way of preventing the N. R. A. expiring on the 16th of June. I did not feel there would be time for a general discussion of the subject in the Senate in the few weeks left and that a vote could not be had on any bill. I therefore voted to report the joint resolution, although I felt that the N. R. A. should be amended and curtailed. I do feel that it has performed great service to certain industries, particularly the textile industry and should not be allowed to die.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement for the RECORD as to my position upon this joint resolution. I recognize that it is futile to argue this question with the hope of changing any votes. Not only were very long negotiations entered into by the alleged proponents and the avowed opponents of N. R. A. before this pending resolution was introduced, but in addition the majority has held a conference upon the joint resolution and determined to support it. Therefore, it is a foregone conclusion that not only is the joint resolution going to be passed, but it is also a foregone conclusion that no amendments, no matter how desirable they might be, will be given any consideration upon their merits.

Nevertheless, it is a very important question with which the Senate is about to deal, and as one member of the Finance Committee I wish to make it perfectly clear that I am unalterably opposed to the joint resolution. I am unalterably opposed to it, Mr. President, in the first place, because I think it is a complete surrender of the legislative responsibility upon the part of the Senate Finance Committee, and that it will be a complete surrender of legislative responsibility upon the part of the Senate and the House of Representatives if it shall be written into law.

The Finance Committee was charged with a certain responsibility under the resolution introduced and sponsored by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN]. For 7 long weeks the committee took testimony, sitting in many instances both in the morning and in the afternoon of each day. We heard those who were opposed to the N. R. A. and to the policies which had been inaugurated under it; we heard those who were in support of it. And then suddenly, when the time came in the usual course of legislative procedure, when the committee, in the light of its investigation and in the light of the facts that had been adduced before it, would have devoted itself to the consideration of the necessary corrective measures, we suddenly were confronted by this joint resolution, which as I stated a few moments ago, was the result of long negotiations upon the part of a number of Senators on the Finance Committee and others who were not members of the committee.

I want it understood that I have been as critical of some of the policies of the National Industrial Recovery Administration as has any other Senator upon this floor. Nevertheless, I must be forced to the conclusion that this joint resolution does not accomplish any good purpose, either from the point of view of those who are opposed to N. R. A. and the policies which have prevailed under it in the past, or from the point of view of those who desire to support the general policies and principles involved in the N. R. A. legislation and in its administration.

I make that statement, because in supporting this joint resolution the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and others who have been most outspoken in their criticism of N. R. A. and its policies, are abandoning their previous position. In short, Mr. President, there is nothing contained in the joint resolution save the provision having to do with price fixing, and the other provision confining the operation of the N. R. A. to industries which are wholly engaged in interstate commerce, which affords any protection from the alleged abuses which have been charged upon this floor by those Senators.

On the other hand, from the point of view of those who are alleged to be supporting N. R. A., from the point of view of the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and from the point of view of other Senators who sit upon the other side of the Chamber, I say that the joint resolution accomplishes no good purpose. In other words, it is a plea of confession and avoidance upon the part of both those who have been the most outspoken critics of N. R. A. and its policies and upon the part of those who have pretended at one time or other to be friends of N. R. A. and its policies.

I make that statement, Mr. President, because if this resolution becomes law I venture the prediction that the National Industrial Recovery Act will be as dead as a doornail. Everyone familiar with the administration of the National Industrial Recovery Act knows, due to the uncertainties created by the termination of the act on June 16 and the uncertainties as to the legislative policy upon the part of Congress for the past 4 months, that there has been a process of rapid disintegration and demoralization of both enforcement and compliance. With that condition perpetuated for another 10 months there will not be enough left of N. R. A. to wad a shotgun.

Furthermore, legislation will have to be considered, if it shall again be considered at all, next April on the eve of a Presidential campaign. I have been in Washington pretty much of the time since 1907, and I have never seen during all that period a session of Congress on the eve of a Presidential campaign which enacted constructive legislation. Sessions of Congress preceding Presidential campaigns are given over largely to political shadow boxing and to maneuvering for political position. So that any Senators who hope some action may be taken at the next session of Congress are, in my opinion, doomed to tragic disappointment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator, of course, well knows that a far-reaching and important law known as the "Adamson Act" was once passed right in the midst of a Presidential campaign.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes. Of course, there have been exceptions, but I think the Senator from Missouri, who has also been in Washington a great deal of the time, will agree that in general the statement which I have made is borne out by the legislative history of the Congress.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Wisconsin made the statement generally. He said he could not recall an instance of an important, constructive piece of legislation being passed during a session of Congress when we were on the eve of a Presidential campaign. I dare say if we were to put our heads together we could recall numerous instances where important legislation has been enacted at such a time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Nevertheless, Mr. President, I stand on the statement that as a general rule sessions of Congress which precede Presidential campaigns do not enact constructive legislation, and that they are usually given over to political maneuvering and to political shadow boxing.

I think it would be better for the country and for everyone else concerned to permit the National Industrial Recovery Act to expire on the 16th of June than to pass this pusillanimous joint resolution. Then, at least, we would have a definite understanding of what was to occur. Now, all of those concerned will be in doubt during this entire period of time.

As I stated a moment ago, I am convinced that during that period of time there will be a rapid disintegration, demoralization, and decay of the whole effort which has been made under the National Industrial Recovery Act.

Mr. President, it has been said by some who support the joint resolution that they do so in the hope that the Supreme Court is going to hand down a decision which will chart the course Congress might follow on the general subject matter involved in the legislation. Perhaps that will occur, but it may not.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I think the Senator will agree that the only reason why the Supreme Court has not heretofore handed down a decision indicating the limitation of Congress in regard to the N. R. A. is due to the very studious and insistent efforts of the N. R. A. authorities to keep the Supreme Court from passing on a case, which was recently illustrated in the case from Georgia, which the N. R. A. authorities and the Department of Justice dismissed on the very day it was set for trial.

The purpose of the joint resolution is to put not only the N. R. A., but industry and everybody else, on notice that the Congress of the United States does not intend to legislate as to controversial matters until it has had an opportunity to have what we have previously done construed by the courts. It is intended to give an opportunity to the Department of Justice and the N. R. A. officials to take their case to the Supreme Court without doing what is planned by Mr. Richberg and the N. R. A. authorities, and that is to make moot cases out of every pending case and give the N. R. A. 2 more years to duck and dodge and avoid having the Supreme Court of the United States say what the Congress may do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have heard the Senator from Missouri make that same statement on numerous occasions, but it does not alter the opinion I was about to express when he interrupted me, namely, that the Supreme Court might disappoint the Senator from Missouri and all other Senators who were expecting the Court to lay down a very broad decision which will afford a chart for the legislative branch of the Government to follow in this legislative field. It is entirely possible that the Court may decline to take such action and that it may decide some of the cases on much narrower grounds than the Senator from Missouri anticipates.

Mr. CLARK. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator unduly, but if he will permit a further suggestion I would say that of course there is no way of compelling the Supreme Court to decide a case on broad lines. There is no way of having a broad decision on fundamental questions unless the Government is willing to present the question to the Supreme Court. It has been a disinclination on the part of the N. R. A., which up to date has prevented a determination by the Supreme Court, assuming the Supreme Court would be willing to decide on broad lines. Certainly they have never been afforded an opportunity up to this time, either on broad or narrow lines, to decide the constitutionality of the N. R. A.

By the joint resolution now before us we are affording an opportunity to the administrative officials of the Government, whether they be N. R. A. or whether they be Department of Justice, to bring before the Supreme Court cases which can be tried and which are now pending, presenting to the Court a broad general issue.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I know that is the Senator's position, but I reiterate that we may come back here at the next session of Congress and find that the Supreme Court has not handed down the type of decision which the Senator is hoping it will hand down. To that extent, if that should prove to be the situation, we would not be any better off than we are at this time.

My point is that what the Senate Finance Committee should have done was to take the evidence and the facts which were adduced at the hearing and proceed, in the light of that investigation, and the experience of nearly 2 years the law has been on the statute books, to write a constructive piece of legislation. A constructive statute should have been brought to the Senate and should have been debated to the extent necessary to give every Senator an opportunity to present his views; and that then the majority of the Senate should have determined what the policy of this legislative body should be in this important field of legislation. Following that, the proposed legislation should have gone to the House and been considered there, and then whatever measure the two Houses agreed upon should have been sent to the President of the United States.

Therefore, so far as I am personally concerned, realizing that there probably will not even be a record vote upon the joint resolution, I wanted to state my opposition to it. So far as my position is concerned, I think it would be much better to let the N. R. A. expire on the 16th of June than to pass this makeshift joint resolution.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, from what I heard of the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]—and I am sorry I did not hear his entire statement—I want the RECORD to show that I agree that the joint resolution should have come here as a measure reflecting the experience of the N. R. A. and the views of the committee as they formulated those views.

I should like to have a vote on an amendment which I desire to offer. I shall not discuss the amendment, but I think it is important. I offer an amendment, on page 2, line 1, after the words "price fixing", to insert the words "including the open system of bids."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 2, line 1, after the words "price fixing", to insert the words "including the open system of bids", so as to make the clause read:

No price fixing, including the open system of bids, shall be permitted or sanctioned under the provisions of any code.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The joint resolution was passed.

SETTLEMENT OF LABOR DISPUTES

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar 595, being the bill (S. 1958) to create a National Labor Relations Board, and so forth.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1958) to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, to diminish the causes of labor disputes, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Education and Labor with amendments.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nomination of Cecil W. Clark to be postmaster at Newcastle, Wyo., in place of E. C. Jessen.

Mr. TRAMMELL, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of several postmasters in the State of Florida.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the calendar is in order.

THE JUDICIARY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Joseph J. McGuigan, of the Canal Zone, to be district attorney, Canal Zone.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

UNITED STATES MARSHAL

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Robert W. Rabb to be United States marshal, middle district of Pennsylvania.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Fred Wheeler to be postmaster at Hudson, N. Y.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This nomination is reported adversely. The question is, Shall the Senate advise and consent to the nomination?

The nomination was rejected.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the remaining nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the remaining nominations of postmasters are confirmed.

IN THE ARMY

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Army.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent that the Army nominations also be confirmed en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate, in legislative session, took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, May 15, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, MAY 14, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, whom Jesus taught us to call "Father", we would wait a moment at the place of prayer before we hurry on to the lessons of the day. As Thy breath is upon us, we pray that old doubts, fears, and suspicions may be forgotten and fraternity and gratitude may flame on the altars of all hearts. Do Thou inspire us with the sacred fidelities which give divine quality to the humblest endeavor. Give us power to free our thoughts from those that dye and stain the mind. May ours be radiant with that faith from which are born inexhaustible hope and unfailing strength. Keep us conscious of our obligations and help us to shun all that is contrary to Thy holy will; strew our paths with golden deeds. We pray for our country, not from the depths of despair but from the heights of vision, rapture, and consecration. In Thy holy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on the following dates the President approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

On May 2, 1935:

H. R. 6457. An act to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the city of Hudson, N. Y., and of the three hundredth anniversary of the founding of the city of Providence, R. I., respectively.

On May 3, 1935:

H. R. 5914. An act to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in connection with the California-Pacific International Exposition to be held in San Diego, Calif., in 1935 and 1936.

On May 6, 1935:

H. R. 3911. An act for the relief of Sarah J. Hitchcock.

On May 7, 1935:

H. R. 3098. An act for the relief of Bertha Ingmire.

On May 8, 1935:

H. R. 1488. An act for the relief of Rose Burke;

H. R. 2473. An act for the relief of William L. Jenkins;

H. R. 3275. An act for the relief of Fred L. Seufert;

H. R. 3370. An act for the relief of Carrie K. Currie, doing business as Atmore Milling & Elevator Co.; and

H. R. 7132. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of Commerce to exchange a portion of the naval station and a portion of the lighthouse reservation at Key West, Fla.

On May 9, 1935:

H. R. 6223. An act making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes.

On May 10, 1935:

H. J. Res. 272. Joint resolution to enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to defray certain expenses incident to the convention of the Imperial Council of the Mystic Shrine, June 8 to June 17, 1935, both inclusive;

H. R. 530. An act granting compensation to the estate of Thomas Peraglia, deceased;

H. R. 2464. An act for the relief of C. H. Hoogendorn;

H. R. 3787. An act for the relief of Robert D. Hutchinson; and

H. R. 5133. An act for the relief of Nellie Oliver.

AIR MAIL SERVICE IN ALASKA

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5159) to authorize the Postmaster General to contract for air mail service in Alaska.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think this is the bill which the gentleman spoke to me about. It has the approval of the Department and also the approval of the former Postmaster General. It relates simply to the carrying of mail in Alaska, and is all right as far as I am concerned.

Mr. DIMOND. The gentleman is correct. This matter was recommended by former Postmaster General Brown and by the present Postmaster General. It is purely local in its operation.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has this bill been approved by the Post Office Committee of the House?

Mr. DIMOND. Oh, yes; unanimously.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill I understand is on the Consent Calendar. We have established a policy that we would not favor the taking up of bills by unanimous consent in this manner when they are on the Consent Calendar. I have no objection to the present bill, but I do not want this established as a permanent policy.

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, I would not ask unanimous consent to call up this bill in this fashion except that the Department would like to have it passed immediately in order to improve the mail service in Alaska. This improvement, I think, may take place without any greater cost to the Government, and I may say there is an emergency existing, and it would be a help to us up there.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of February 21, 1925 (43 Stat. 960; 39 U. S. C. 488), is amended to read as follows:

"The Postmaster General may provide difficult or emergency mail service in Alaska, including the establishment and equipment of relay stations, in such manner as he may think advisable, without advertising therefor; and he is authorized, in his discretion, to contract, after advertisement in accordance with law, for the carriage of all classes of mail within the Territory of Alaska, by airplane, payment therefor to be made from the appropriation for star-route service in Alaska."

UNIFORM PENSION ACT

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to address the House upon a question which I feel will be of interest to every Member, as well as to our constituents, veterans and taxpayers. I refer to the adoption of a uniform national policy regarding benefits extended to our veterans and their dependents. I believe the necessity for such a course is clearly apparent.

FORMATION OF PRESENT PENSION SYSTEM—ECONOMY ACT

For a great many years pension law after pension law has been written into our statutes with no regard to the pension system as a whole. This has resulted in a hodge-podge of inequalities; a system satisfactory to no one. Our veterans complain of its inequalities and uncertainties; our taxpayers of its cost and inefficiency. The law applying to any particular case is lost in a maze of statutes and regulations; to find the correct answer is difficult and expensive. In many cases the correct answer is evidently never found and these cases come up again and again for rerating and redetermination.

The Economy Act was applied to this situation. Many of the old laws were untouched and some of them were reenacted by it. New rules and regulations were added and the uncertainties increased. This act and the rules and regulations issued under it became the law of the land on March 20, 1935. The Economy Act was admittedly enacted with the greatest of haste in the face of an emergency. That there are inequalities in the kind and character of benefits extended to the veterans of different wars under present laws is undeniable. Veterans are thrown together in their organization meetings, work, and social life. They are familiar with the patent injustices that exist, hence dissatisfaction and complaints increase.

So long as the Economy Act remains the law, there will be constant attempts to amend it for the benefit of some special classes; hence I feel that it is urgent that the Government adopt a definite national policy at the earliest practicable date, before the pressure of some of these special classes destroys even the few benefits contained in the Economy Act.

Many changes have been suggested by various organizations for the consideration of Congress, the adoption of which would tend to multiply the present inequalities and increase the annual budget for veterans' relief. If inequalities and inconsistencies in existing laws are to be corrected and expenditures kept within reasonable bounds, steps having to do with veterans' legislation must be taken only after the most careful consideration.

PRESENT SYSTEM TOO EXPENSIVE—PERSONNEL

The present system is too expensive. When I make this statement, I do so after careful study and consideration, and I mean that of every dollar appropriated for the relief of the veteran too much is lost in costs, redtape, overhead, and inefficient administration before it reaches the beneficiary.

Looking back over the old reports of the Bureau of Pensions, I find, from 1891 to 1894, inclusive, they had the largest number of employees at any one time in their service. This large number of employees for that service is a surprisingly low figure of 2,009. At that time they were paying pensions based on services rendered during the Revolutionary War, our early Indian wars, War of 1812, War with Tripoli, Mexican War, Civil War, and various Indian campaigns. They were, even with the low rate of pensions paid at that time, disbursing $140,000,000 annually direct to veterans and their dependents. The 2,009 employees received $2,508,810 average salaries during those years. The entire cost of operation, which included medical service, supplies, equipment, field service, and maintenance, averaged only $4,898,665 for those years.

In 1898 the peak of Civil War pensions was reached, when the Bureau had 745,822 Civil War veterans on the pension rolls and a total number of pensioners of 993,714. It disbursed $145,000,000 with only 1,836 employees, who were paid $2,281,710 in salaries. The expenses of the Bureau for that year were $4,114,000.

It is interesting to note that from 1868 to 1931, inclusive, when the old Bureau of Pensions was consolidated with the present Veterans' Administration, although the Bureau disbursed more than eight and one-half billions of dollars in the form of pensions to veterans and their dependents, the cost of maintenance and expenses of all descriptions for the operation was only $152,957,460.46.

According to the report of the Administrator of Veterans Affairs for 1934, there was in June a total of 838,855 veterans' cases on the rolls. This includes the living veterans and the dependents of our deceased veterans, representing the total of all those drawing pensions. Under the present system, it requires 34,890 employees to take care of these cases. There is approximately one person on the Veterans' Administration pay roll for every 24 cases on the pension rolls. I ask you to remember that in 1898 the old Pension Bureau had 993,714 cases on the rolls, yet had only 1,836 employees, or approximately 1 on the pay roll for every 542 on the pension roll.

Drawing a further comparison between 1898 and 1934, cases on the rolls have decreased 15.5 percent and the number of employees handling the work has increased from 1,836 to 34,890, an increase of over 1,800 percent.

Does the Administrator of Veterans Affairs intend to do anything to decrease his own standing army of employees? He cites the amount taken from the veterans by the Economy

Act; does he intend to apply to his own organization the same drastic principles of economy so ruthlessly applied to our veterans? Does he intend to remove any of his 34,890 employees from the pay roll as freely as he removed veterans from the pension roll? Is any of the more than $55,000,000 now paid annually for salaries by the Veterans' Administration to be saved?

Here is the answer, from page 89, hearing on the first deficiency appropriation bill for 1935 before the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations:

General HINES. Yes, sir. We have had cases where we have put the regional office and the soldiers' home together, or where the situation would allow it, a hospital and a regional office or a home and a regional office together. * * * Off-hand, it might be said that we are adding to the unemployment problem, but we have not done either, because by merging as we go along with the opening up of new activities, we are able to absorb much of the personnel that would become surplus, and in that way we are accomplishing economies without also adding to the burden in other directions.

I am sure that we are all in sympathy with the employment movement, but I am equally sure that this is one governmental activity which will be far more economically conducted without the assistance of the Veterans' Administration. Money appropriated for war veterans is presumably appropriated for that purpose and not for conducting either an employment office or a reemployment bureau. If the Veterans' Administration is going to take over the employment situation along with the many other activities that the General has been gradually gathering under his benevolent wing, a direct appropriation should be made for that purpose, but for the love of heaven, let us not call it veterans' relief!

It is a self-evident fact that any economies devised for the efficient operation of the Veterans' Administration and the reduction of the present vast overhead, must be worked out from the outside and forced in. This task is a proper one for the Congress to undertake.

PILING UP ADMINISTRATIVE COST

So much for the personnel. Let us now further regard the cost of administration. Over a 63-year period from 1868 to 1931, the Pension Bureau disbursed approximately $8,500,000,000 at a total cost of $152,957,460, which is less than 1.8 percent and covered the entire cost of administration, including salaries. Then came the Veterans' Administration with new ideas of efficiency and economy. In 1934 the Administration disbursed $594,022,058.08; and $55,810,584, or about 9.39 percent, went for salaries alone. This, Mr. Speaker, was not the entire cost of administration as in the case of the 1.8 percent, but was for salaries only.

If we say nothing of the added administrative cost, and could simply reduce the salaries alone to the 1.8 percent quoted, the Government would have saved about $48,709,808 in 1934 on that single item. It is a significant fact that for every $4 paid in military pensions of every class in 1932, about $1 was paid for salaries to compensate those who paid the other four. I refer you to page 152 of the report of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, 1932, for verification of that statement.

In the face of such conditions, we read with interest the statement of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs appearing in his report for 1932, that—

Important administrative savings which have been possible, and might, under a stable load, have been conclusively apparent, following this consolidation, have, however, been obscured by the very materially increased load which has confronted the Veterans' Administration in all directions since its organization, due to amendatory legislation affecting all forms of financial relief.

Searching through this same report for further light on administrative costs, we find on page 1 that the entire administrative cost for 1932 was only 3.75 percent, which is not so bad, even remembering prior administrative costs of 1.8 percent, but on page 61 of that report we find that of the total disbursements made by the Veterans' Administration 2.61 percent went for salaries in hospitals, 0.57 percent to pay those working in soldiers' homes, 2 percent to those in field offices, and 1.20 percent to central office employees. According to almost anyone's arithmetic, these add up to 6.38 percent instead of 3.75 percent, and nothing is said of the balance of administrative costs.

It is quite evident from the viewpoint of national policy and a balanced Budget that the problem of veterans' relief merits the most careful consideration of the legislative and executive branches of the Government. It is the clear duty of Congress to get the greatest possible results in services for the money available for a specific purpose.

Appearing before the Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, when the independent offices appropriation bill for 1936 was being considered, General Hines submitted the following estimate shown on page 175:

Salaries and expenses.....	$86,700,000
Printing and binding.....	125,000
Pensions.....	400,760,000
Military and naval insurance.....	116,910,000
Hospital and domiciliary facilities and services.....	925,000
Adjusted-service certificate fund.....	100,000,000
Total for veterans' activities.....	705,420,000

Analysis shows that about 12.25 percent of that vast sum is going for administrative costs, including salaries which amount to 7.75 percent of the total appropriation asked; 56.94 percent is intended for present benefits to our veterans, and 30.7 percent for future benefits which they may get—sometime—if and when they live long enough.

SIZE AND SCOPE OF VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

The Veterans' Administration was authorized as an independent agency by act of July 3, 1930, and by Executive order of July 21, 1930, there were considered therein under a single control the Bureau of Pensions, the United States Veterans' Bureau, and the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs has control, direction, and management of all agencies and activities comprising the Veterans' Administration; is chairman of the Federal Board of Hospitalization; is responsible for extending relief to veterans and dependents of veterans in the way of pensions, Government military and naval insurance, adjusted compensation, emergency officers' retirement pay, and hospital and domiciliary care.

The Veterans' Administration, in addition to its central office in Washington, with its 5,052 employees, operates regional offices or combined regional offices and hospitals in every State except Delaware, and maintains and operates 72 hospitals and 14 soldiers' homes, necessitating the services of about 30,415 more employees. Salaries for this army of employees totaled $58,528,639 for 1933.

LACK OF UNIFORMITY, EQUALITY, AND JUSTICE

Our present pension system knows no such thing as equality. It presents to the eye a patchwork of old legislation, new legislation, reenacted legislation, regulations, and precedents; the whole conglomeration subject to still further variation by interpretation, reinterpretation, and bureaucratic ideas, used to fill in the numerous gaps and uncertainties of the law. Out of this jumbled mess, no one can hope for the equality and justice which should be the very foundation of any pension system.

The most urgent need at the present time is a codification of pension laws. This necessity has been realized for some time past, but never more so than since the passage of the so-called "Economy Act", which repealed all laws granting pensions since the beginning of the War with Spain, April 21, 1898, and has resulted in the granting of pensions pursuant to Executive orders and regulations, which have been changed several times and in the administration of which there have been reviews upon reviews, delays, confusion, and a piling up of work within the Veterans' Administration almost to the point of demoralization of service, creating wide-spread discontent throughout the length and breadth of the land in the ranks of all classes of veterans and their widows and dependents. These same orders and regulations today constitute the great body of pension law dealing with service in all our late wars.

We find veterans of one war drawing pensions at specified rates for certain degrees of disability, while veterans of another war, of the same age and under the same disabilities draw something entirely different. For example, suffering a 25-percent disability, nonservice connected, a veteran with 30 days' service in the Indian wars receives $20. Under the same disabilities a Spanish War veterans must have 70 days to get $9 and 90 days to get $15. A World War veteran must show total and permanent disability before he can get anything for non-service-connected disabilities.

In providing for pensions based upon the present age of the veteran, rates have been established for veterans of the Indian wars ranging from $20 to $50. The 90-day Spanish veteran's rate ranges from $22.50 to $45. The 70-day veteran of the War with Spain, from $9 to $22.50. If the World War veteran lives to be a hundred and no new laws are passed, he can get nothing in the way of a pension based upon his age.

I may add that the inequalities existing between widows and orphans of our various wars are even more glaring. It is small wonder that our veterans and their dependents murmur and find fault with the present system.

In place of this hodge-podge of laws, orders, and regulations there should be enacted a law granting uniform benefits which might be administered along lines of simplicity and directness, and with the same degree of economy and efficiency as marked the operations of the old Pension Bureau during its existence of almost 100 years.

UNCERTAINTY OF PRESENT SYSTEM COSTS THE TAXPAYERS AND PENALIZES OUR VETERANS

Practically all our pension legislation has been enacted under the stress of the moment whenever a group of veterans could convince the Congress that some remedy or relief was needed to meet their particular difficulties. We have taken neither the time nor the trouble to formulate a plan which would place all veterans under the same uniform system and give to each of them a just compensation in keeping with age, degree of disability, and service rendered. It has long been the practice to grant veterans of each particular war small pensions after the close of the war. Later larger pensions are provided for, the law usually having application to the veterans of only one war. As the veterans of that war grow old and infirm, other laws are passed and higher pensions provided. It is readily apparent that the treatment accorded each group of veterans has been governed largely by the strength of the voice of that particular group and the temper of the Congress then in session. Certainly a plan to grant all pensions under a uniform system flexible enough to provide for the present and the future can and should be worked out. It should no longer be necessary to run one of the largest branches of the Government under a hit-and-miss system, which amounts in the final analysis to no system.

As I have stated, in 1898 the old Pension Bureau handled 993,714 cases. Today 34,890 employees take care of the 838,855 on the rolls. Uncertainty and lack of uniform policy have contributed largely to the increase in expense and personnel. General Hines did express that truth by his statement before quoted, that—

Important administrative savings which have been possible, and might under a stable load have been conclusively apparent, * * * have, however, been obscured by the very materially increased load which has confronted the Veterans' Administration in all directions since its organization, due to amendatory legislation affecting all forms of financial relief.

It might be well, however, to add, from my own observations, that any possible savings have not only been obscured but entirely and deeply buried under the ever-increasing burden of administrative costs and high salaries paid to those deciding minor points of law which should have been made decisive in the body of the law. In 1933 the Veterans' Administration employed 857 lawyers at salaries ranging from $2,600 to $9,000 per year.

Not only do the American taxpayers suffer in increased cost of operating the Veterans' Administration and maintaining the redtape factory of that organization, but our veterans suffer from the uncertainty of the law. When a veteran goes to bed at night he never knows what the Veterans' Administration will do to him by some freak ruling before he awakens in the morning. He may go to bed disabled and drawing a pension sufficient to meet his needs, but may awaken in the morning to find that he has not only lost his pension but is indebted to the Government. I have seen instances of these ghastly mistakes in my own congressional district. I have personal knowledge of one particular case of a veteran whose pension was reduced to a small fraction of the original amount and in addition he found himself indebted to the Veterans' Administration in the sum of $2,000. The indebtedness being for pension paid under what the Veterans' Administration called "an error." Yet the veteran was totally disabled and had done nothing to mislead or misinform the Government. He was informed that the $2,000 could be paid back at once or his pitiful pension would be taken to pay it. Unfortunately, such tragic blunders are not rare; several of them have come to my attention.

Even if the veteran is satisfied with his pension, it seems that in some cases the Veterans' Administration can never be quite sure that he is correctly pensioned. I have in mind a case where the veteran, with no action on his part, was reduced from a substantial pension to a mere pittance without reexamination. After a series of reratings, still with no action or request on his part, he was placed back on the rolls at about $2 less than he was getting in the beginning. A statement of the ratings given constituted nearly a page of single-spaced typewritten matter, covering manipulations extending over a period of months. In the meantime the veteran and his family suffered while someone had the doubtful satisfaction of juggling the case.

COORDINATION WHOLLY LACKING

It has been the policy of our Government to deal with the veterans of each war in separate groups. At times these groups have been further subdivided. It is this feature of the present system which brings us to the realization that we can never have a just pension system until a uniform pension law is enacted and a means of coordination devised. A way must be found to keep the veterans of all wars upon a just and equitable basis. I have always believed that the service, age, and physical condition of the veteran should govern his compensation. There is neither justice nor logic in making it depend upon the name of the war in which he served. Yet at the present time there is no means of coordination. No authority exists for that purpose.

There is no thought of criticism of Congress for the imperfections in the legislation governing existing benefits. Each enactment or amendment to existing legislation has been made in response to urgent representations and demands of different groups. In many instances these demands were so insistent and immediate in character as to preclude deliberate consideration and action such as might have evolved more uniform provisions. I believe the chief cause of these inequalities and injustices was the fact that all earlier legislation had to be taken up piecemeal, as it were, and the needs of each group of veterans had to be handled separately, because the benefits were to be dispensed or administered by many different Government agencies and legislation pertaining to their affairs was handled by several different committees in both Houses of Congress. For the reasons stated, it was impracticable for Congress to attempt to arrange all groups of veterans and benefits in classes for comparative study and then correct or eliminate certain features by one piece of legislation.

To remedy this situation, I propose the establishment of a Joint Congressional Committee on Veterans' Affairs comprised of Members of both the House and Senate, with power to investigate the operation and effects of our pension system; to investigate the administration of pension laws and measures and methods for the simplification of such laws and their administration. Said committee to report from time to time to the proper committees of the House and Senate.

A DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS' AFFAIRS

Considering the fact that there are approximately 35,000 employees in the Veterans' Administration and that the expenditures of the Administration are approximately one-half of the total revenue of the Government, it is my opinion that it is proper and timely that this governmental activity should be placed under the head of a Cabinet officer, who would be the directing head of a department that would rank along side of the other great administrative departments of our Government.

This Cabinet officer would be in a position to secure better results for both taxpayers and the veterans, and would be in a position at all times to visualize to the President and the Congress the picture of veterans' benefits, which would result in a more simplified procedure and, consequently, greater economies.

In 1933 the Veterans' Administration, now an independent establishment, disbursed $368,688,479.42. It paid pensions, compensation, disability allowances, and emergency officers' retirement pay to 997,918 veterans and 272,749 dependents of veterans, gave hospital medical service to 136,626 veterans and out-patient medical service to 256,652 individuals, and took care of 24,225 veterans in soldiers' homes.

To June 30, 1933, it acted upon 3,990,674 applications for adjusted compensation, involving $3,717,487,218.21. It was concerned in life insurance of 637,049, the value of whose insurance was $2,925,618,222.52.

When consideration is given to the fact that the disbursements of the Veterans' Administration are far in excess of those of any of the departments of the Government, except the Post Office Department, which is largely self-supporting; that in its many and diversified activities, involving monetary benefits of various kinds, insurance annuities, adjusted compensation, hospitalization, domiciliary care, construction of hospitals, and so forth, it directly contacts several millions of our people and indirectly benefits many more millions; that in point of numbers of employees it is exceeded by only four of our Government activities, one of which is our great Postal Service, the conclusion must be that so great an activity of our Government should constitute a department with a Cabinet official, the Department of Veterans' Affairs, with a Secretary in charge of its activities. To such a department might be assigned those activities now existent and that may be brought into being that carried grants or benefits to our civilian population, as compensation, annuities, old-age pensions, and so forth. Such a department could work out systems that would be uniform in character, formulate legislation that would be equitable to all beneficiaries, and bring order out of the present chaos of the hodge-podge of laws and regulations that are difficult of administration and so exasperating in their inequalities as to stir up wide-spread dissatisfaction that bodes no good to any party that may be in power.

The President's Cabinet is his official family, the members of which meet frequently to consider and discuss important matters. Opportunity is afforded for exchange of views, a determination as to how projects advanced by one Cabinet officer may affect the departments presided over by other Cabinet officers, and opportunity afforded for coordination and the elimination of overlapping and duplication. It can surely not be gainsaid that the Veterans' Administration has so many great problems and such vast and far-reaching activities that opportunity should be afforded the heads of departments at Cabinet meetings to consider them, and to bring this about means the creation of a department. Examination of cabinet set-ups in other great nations reveals that to certain ministers or secretaries are assigned portfolios dealing with pensions. This is practically true of Great Britain and France, and even our neighbor to the north of us, Canada, has its Minister of Pensions. In Great Britain, under the Secretary for Home Affairs, are centered war pensions, old-age pensions, national health and unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation, hospitalization, and kindred public social services.

INTRODUCING A NEW SYSTEM

Because of the conditions outlined, I have introduced H. R. 5279 and H. R. 7375 for the consideration of this Congress. These bills are similar to my bills, H. R. 6206 and H. R. 6207, introduced on January 3, 1934, the opening day of the Seventy-third Congress. Also to H. R. 9954 and H. R. 9955, which I introduced on June 15, 1934.

Many years ago I advocated a uniform policy and several years ago I drafted the framework of these present bills. After careful consideration of their every provision, I admit, due to human frailty, they may not be perfect bills, and I have never seen a perfect bill; yet I do maintain that their principles are just, and they substitute for the present jumbled and disjointed pension legislation a comprehensive and permanent uniform national policy applicable today and equally applicable tomorrow.

This proposed legislation is not destructive of the present governmental policy with respect to veterans' affairs. It repeals and modifies all prior laws concerning veterans' relief, but it does so only for the purpose of substituting a just, permanent, and uniform national policy.

H. R. 7375 is a bill to establish a Department of Veterans' Affairs with a Secretary of Veterans' Affairs at the head thereof, to abolish the Veterans' Administration and transfer its functions pertaining to veterans' affairs to such department, to adjust and equalize pensions of veterans and widows and dependents of veterans, and for other purposes.

H. R. 5279 proposes to adjust and equalize benefits for veterans and widows and dependents of veterans.

I have transmitted copies of my bills introduced in the Seventy-fourth Congress to the various departments and requested reports. I have also forwarded copies to the Honorable Chairmen of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation and the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, suggesting that the respective committees hold hearings on this proposed legislation, at which time I will endeavor to explain this much-needed codification, simplification, and equalization of our pension laws and the merits of the plan proposed.

I believe that there is urgent need for immediate action. I desire to direct your attention to the fact that much is being said and written today regarding social legislation which will affect the economic welfare of our citizens as a whole. I wish to make it perfectly clear that I am heartily in accord with legislation which will grant our indigent aged an old-age pension; which will grant to our citizens who are unable to secure employment in times of depression and economic unrest, or who are only seasonably employed, an unemployment insurance; and which will grant to those who are fortunate enough to have employment through life, by their own contributions, and old-age annuity, that they may enjoy the evening time of life.

I am sure that there is not one of us who has been sympathetic to the just demands of our veterans, and who has consistently supported legislation for their welfare, who does not realize that it will be very difficult to secure in succeeding Congresses the consideration of liberalized legislation in their behalf.

It is a simple problem of reasoning, weighing the demands of special classes, and I refer to the veterans as opposed to the masses. In brief, the veterans will be in the minority, with the masses who are receiving and demanding old-age pensions, unemployment insurance, and old-age annuities in the majority. I believe it behooves every veteran and the representatives of every veterans' organization in the country to give this matter serious and constructive consideration. I say, therefore, to you veterans, and to the leaders of your organizations, that if a just, generous, and definite national policy is to be worked out, which will be of material aid to you and your dependents, it must be done before the gavel falls on the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress.

I recommend to the Congress that they take action, looking toward the simplification and codification of laws granting benefits to veterans and their dependents, so that we may be able to understand what a veteran or his dependents may be entitled to without wading through innumerable laws, regulations, and decisions, each succeeding one of which contradicts the one before it. I would urge your serious and earnest consideration of H. R. 5279 and H. R. 7375.

AIM AND OPERATION OF PROPOSED PLAN

The underlying principles of these bills aim to secure better coordination, added efficiency, and a more complete economic use of existing facilities. Also to improve the service rendered to the veterans and equalize the benefits extended to them, with more real satisfaction to the veterans and less cost to the taxpayers.

My bills substitute a definite plan in specific terms for the broad, general, and uncertain terms of the Economy Act, but they do not destroy any of the just principles that are contained in the Economy Act and section 20 of the independent offices appropriation act, nor the executive regulations issued to carry out the provisions of the Economy Act, which are beneficial to the veterans and their dependents.

I have drafted into each of these bills, either of which will, if enacted, codify into one law all the pension provisions hitherto scattered throughout the statutes and enacted as far back as July 14, 1862. Both are so drafted in form that they can be readily amended or expanded to meet changing conditions. For once the veteran will be able to pick up one single law, and by a brief examination thereof determine definitely what his rights as a veteran are.

My objective in drafting H. R. 5279 and H. R. 7375 was to submit to the Congress a sound, uniform national policy, applicable to our veterans of future wars as well as to those of past wars. These bills establish three general classes: War-time service-connected disabilities, war-time non-service-connected disabilities, and peace-time service-connected disabilities.

I am of the opinion that while some of the provisions of my bills are more liberal with regard to benefits extended our veterans, there will be little additional cost to our Government. The simplification of operative procedure and proper administration should mean an annual saving of several million dollars in administrative costs. If either bill is enacted, I believe that the personnel of the Veterans' Administration can be reduced one-third or one-half.

A sound pension system should be flexible and apply to existing and future conditions. It should be uniform and equitable as to its operation upon the veterans of all wars. It should be clear and concise in expression and in understandable form. As a matter of economy, overhead and administrative expense should be reduced to the minimum. Such a system should coordinate all pension laws and provide means for continued coordination.

These features I have endeavored to incorporate into my bills, and, while I am aware that they are not perfect, I feel that they do represent a definite step in the right direction. They represent a new deal for the veterans, their dependents, and the taxpayers of the country. I hope that they will point the way out of the morass of jumbled pension laws and out of the forest of red tape now surrounding the subject.

In order that the Membership of the House and others may be fully informed as to the contents of this proposed uniform pension bill, I submit herewith a résumé and index of the bill arranged by sections and pages.

THE UNDERWOOD BILL

(H. R. 7375)

Uniform Pensions Act, 1935

To establish a Department of Veterans' Affairs with a Secretary of Veterans' Affairs at the head thereof, to abolish the Veterans' Administration and transfer its functions pertaining to veterans' affairs to such department, to adjust and equalize pensions of veterans and widows and dependents of veterans, and for other purposes

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS' AFFAIRS

Section 1: (a) Provides for the establishment of a Department of Veterans' Affairs, at the head of which shall be a Secretary of Veterans' Affairs, who shall be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall receive compensation at the rate of $15,000 per annum.

(b) Provides for the transfer of all the duties, functions, and powers of the Veterans' Administration to the Department of Veterans' Affairs and the abolishment of the Veterans' Administration as an independent executive establishment.

(c) Provides for the abolishment of the office of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and transfers the functions, powers, and duties to the Secretary of Veterans' Affairs.

(d) Section 158 of the Revised Statutes is amended to include the Department of Veterans' Affairs, and the provisions of title IV of the Revised Statutes as now and hereafter amended shall be applicable to the department.

(e) Provides for a seal for the department.

Section 2: (a) Provides for the transfer of records and property, including furniture and equipment, and such of the officers and employees as are deemed indispensable for the efficient operation of the Department of Veterans' Affairs and the transfer or furlough of others; and that in the transfer of officers and employees no change in classification and compensation be made, but provides that such changes in titles and designations as may be necessary may be made after the transfer.

(b) Provides for the transfer of all appropriations made for the Veterans' Administration to the Department of Veterans' Affairs.

Section 3: (a) Provides that the secretary of veterans' affairs shall administer, execute, and enforce the provisions of this act and prescribe such regulations as may be necessary and appropriate to carry out such provisions.

(b) Authorizes the secretary of veterans' affairs to establish such sections, divisions, and branch offices in the department as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act and to appoint or designate the chief officers thereof, to abolish such regional offices and suboffices as he may deem unnecessary, and transfer records and supplies relative thereto to the central office or otherwise as he may prescribe, and directs that branch offices established under this act shall be maintained in department facilities or other quarters owned by the United States, and authorizes the secretary to appoint such other officers, legal counsel, physicians, surgeons, experts, inspectors, and assistants as may be necessary, and all employees (except as the President may deem advisable shall be subject to the civil-service laws and regulations. The secretary may require the opinion of the Attorney General on any question of law arising under this act.

(c) Provides that all orders, rules, regulations, awards, grants, permits, or other privileges made, issued, or granted by or in respect of the Veterans' Administration, in effect on the effective date of this act, shall, subject to the provisions of titles I to VI, both inclusive, of this act, continue in effect until modified, superseded, or revoked by the secretary.

Section 4: Directs that the secretary shall file with the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate on the 3d day of January of each year a full and complete report of all the activities of the department, and a full and itemized statement of all moneys received and disbursed in the preceding fiscal year.

Section 5: Authorizes the secretary to sell, lease, or exchange surplus equipment, supplies, products, or waste materials belonging to the department; and to lease for terms not exceeding 3 years, lands or buildings or parts or parcels thereof, belonging to the United States and under the control of the department of veterans' affairs, the net proceeds thereof to be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

TITLE I: PENSIONS FOR WAR-TIME SERVICE—SUBTITLE A; DISABILITY DUE TO SERVICE

Part I: Civil War; Spanish-American War; World War

Section 101: (a) Grants pension of from $10 to $100 per month for disability incurred in service and line of duty in time of war.

(b) (1) Grants $15 per month for the loss or loss of use of one hand, one foot, or one eye additional to those specified in subsection (a).

(2) Grants $25 per month for the loss of a leg at or above the knee or an arm at or above the elbow additional to the rates specified in subsection (a).

(5) Grants $200 per month for loss or loss of use of one hand or one foot in addition to blindness of both eyes, in lieu of rates specified in subsection (a).

(6) Grants $250 per month for loss or loss of use of both hands or both feet or one hand and one foot in addition to blindness of both eyes, or loss or loss of use of both hands and both feet, in lieu of rates specified in subsection (a).

Section 102: (a) Provides that the widow of any person who died as a result of an injury incurred, disease contracted, or the aggravation of an injury or disease, as specified in subsection (a) of section 101 of this title, shall be paid:

(1) A pension at the rate of $30 per month, if she has not yet attained the age of 50 years.

(2) A pension at the rate of $35 per month, if now or hereafter attains the age of 50 years.

(3) A pension at the rate of $40 per month, if now or hereafter attains the age of 65 years.

(4) A pension at the rate of $50 per month, regardless of age, if she was the wife during the period of such service.

(5) An additional pension at the rate of $8 per month shall be paid for each child of such person.

(b) In case such person is not survived by a widow entitled to pension under this act, and is survived by a child or children, such child or children shall be paid pension at the following rates per month: One child, $30, with $8 additional for each additional child, the total amount to be equally divided.

Section 103: (a) Provides that after 90 days' service prior soundness shall be presumed except as to defects noted at enlistment or evidence or medical finding that disability existed prior to enlistment.

(b) Provides that a chronic disease showing a 10-percent disability within 2 years shall be held to have been contracted in service, provided the person served 3 months, unless affirmatively shown otherwise.

(c) Provides that an increase in a disability existing prior to enlistment shall be held to be aggravated by service unless there be a specific finding that the increase in disability is due to the natural course of the disease.

(d) Provides that any person who applied for enlistment and was provisionally accepted or was drafted or called into service and incurred a disability in line of duty prior to muster into the service of the United States shall be entitled to have such disability considered as having been incurred in the active military or naval service.

(e) Provides that any person who entered into an enlistment or employment in the active military or naval service of the United States—

(1) Which is held to constitute service in the Civil War under section 171 and incurred a disease or injury or aggravation of a preexisting disease or injury, in line of duty, during such enlistment or employment, but not later than August 20, 1866, shall be deemed to have incurred such disease, injury, or aggravation in the Civil War.

(2) Similar provision as to the War with Spain as defined in subsection (a) of section 172 with the last date July 4, 1902.

(3) Similar provision as to Philippine Insurrection and China Relief Expedition as defined in subsection (b) of section 172 with the last date July 4, 1902.

(4) Similar provision as to World War as defined in section 173 with the last date July 2, 1921.

Part II: Combat service; combined peace and war-time service

Section 121: Directs payment of pension at war-time rates when there has been service in both peace time and war time and pensionable disability incurred in each.

Section 122: Provides for payment of pension at war-time rates for disability or death incurred in combat in any Indian campaign or any military expedition or occupation.

Section 123: Provides a 5-percent increase to any pension to which a veteran may be otherwise entitled (exclusive of Medal of Honor pensions) in case he actually participated in combat with an enemy of the United States, and a like increase to the widow of any veteran who so participated, if otherwise entitled to pension under this act and was the wife of the veteran during the period of such service.

Section 124: Provides for the reduction from 65 years to 50 years of the age at which Medal of Honor pensioners may be entitled to the extra pension provided by the act of April 27, 1916 (reenacted in sec. 641 of this act), and extends its provisions to veterans of Indian campaigns and military expeditions and occupations.

Subtitle B: Disability not due to service

Part III: Indian campaigns

Section 131: (a) Provides that if a veteran has rendered 30 days' service in any Indian war or campaign in connection with or in the zone of active Indian hostilities and his service therein was honorably terminated he shall be paid pension at the following rates per month:

(1) If not qualified under clause (2) or (3) hereof, $50 per month;

(2) If his physical or mental condition is such as to require the frequent and periodical, though not regular or constant, aid and attendance of another person, $65; and

(3) If his physical or mental condition is such as to require the regular or constant aid and attendance of another person, $72.

Section 132: (a) Provides that the widow of any veteran as described in section 131 of this title shall be paid pension at the following rates per month, with $6 per month additional for each child of such person: If aged less than 70 years, $30; if the wife of the veteran during the period of his service or if aged 70 years, $40.

(b) Provides that in case such veteran is not survived by a widow entitled to pension under this act and is survived by a child or children, such child or children shall be paid pension at the following rates for month: One child, $20, with $6 additional for each additional child, the total amount to be equally divided, and in the event the widow has remarried and pension has been granted to a child or children she shall not be entitled until the pension of the child or children terminates unless they are in her care and custody, and when and if pension be granted to such remarried widow, the pension to the child or children shall cease.

Section 133: Sets forth the different classes of evidence that may be accepted to show service in Indian campaigns.

Part IV: Civil War

Section 141: Grants a pension of $75 per month to veterans of the Civil War who rendered 90 days' service and were honorably discharged or who, having served less than 90 days, were discharged on account of a disability incurred in the service and line of duty or who are now on the pension rolls under existing pension laws.

Section 142: Grants a pension of $100 per month to veterans as described in section 141 who are helpless or blind or so nearly helpless or blind as to require the regular aid and attendance of another person.

Section 143: (a) Grants a pension to widows of Civil War veterans as described in section 141 as follows:

(1) If the wife of the veteran during his service in the Civil War, $50 per month.

(2) If married to the veteran after his service and before June 27, 1905, and has attained the age of 70 years, $40 per month.

(3) If married to the veteran after his service and before June 27, 1905, and has not attained the age of 70 years, $30 per month until such time as she shall attain the age of 70 years.

(4) If married to the veteran on or after June 27, 1905, and before June 27, 1915, and lived with and cared for him for at least 5 years next preceding his death, $20 per month.

(5) Grants an additional pension of $6 per month for each child of the veteran.

Section 144: Provides that if a person has been honorably discharged from any subsequent contract of service in the Civil War, he shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from all previous contracts of service in said war if (1) he served at least 6 months under any subsequent enlistment, (2) his entire service under such subsequent enlistment was faithful, and (3) he did not receive by reason of such enlistment any bounty or gratuity, other than from the United States, in excess of that to which he would have been entitled had he continued to serve faithfully until honorably discharged from any contract of service previously entered into by him during the Civil War.

Part V: War with Spain, China Relief Expedition, and the Philippine Insurrection

Section 151: (a) Provides that any person who rendered 90 days' service in the War with Spain (including the China Relief Expedition and the Philippine Insurrection) and was honorably discharged from such service, or who rendered less than 90 days' service, was discharged on account of a disability incurred in such service and line of duty shall be paid pension at the following rates per month:

Section 303. Traveling expenses to be paid only when veteran has been ordered to report to departmental facility.

Section 304. No domiciliary, medical, or hospital care for any person residing outside the continental limits of the United States, its Territories, and possessions.

Section 305. Authorizes the Secretary to issue necessary regulations relative to benefits under this part.

Section 306. Provides for reimbursement to beneficiaries in hospitals or departmental facilities for loss by fire of personal effects destroyed by fire while stored in designated locations. Application to be filed within 1 year.

Part II: Medical care and supplies, orthopedic appliances

Section 321: Provides for furnishing medical, surgical, and dental services, and orthopedic appliances and the manner in which orthopedic appliances may be obtained; and further provides that not oftener than once in 3 years, if he so elects, the person may receive in lieu of such limb or apparatus the money value thereof at the following rates: For an artificial leg, $125; for an artificial arm, $100; for an artificial foot, $100; and for apparatus for resection, $100.

Part III: Burial allowance

Section 331: Provides for the furnishing of a flag to drape casket of deceased veteran of any war whose service was honorably terminated.

Section 332: Provides for the allowance of $100 for funeral expense of the veteran of any war if net assets at the time of death do not exceed $1,000.

Section 333: Provides for the allowance of $100 for the burial and transportation of the body of a veteran who dies in a Bureau facility.

Section 334: Relates to claims for accrued pension to reimburse the person who bore the expense of the funeral of a veteran.

Part IV: Injury or aggravation of injury during hospitalization

Section 341: Grants pension for injury or aggravation of injury while undergoing hospitalization, training, medical or surgical treatment or medical examination in lieu of benefits under act of September 7, 1916. Application to be filed within 2 years.

TITLE IV: CONDITIONS AND LIMITATIONS ON PAYMENT OF PENSION

Part I: Income, employment, and residence

Section 401: (a) Prohibits payments of pension based on non-service-connected disabilities if the beneficiary is single and has an income of $1,000 per annum, or if married or supports dependents and has an income of $2,500 per annum.

(b) Describes "dependent" as used in this section as a child, father, mother, brother, or sister who is dependent for his or her main support upon the pensioner.

Section 402: Prohibits payment of pension to any person who for a period in excess of 6 months resides outside the territorial jurisdiction of the United States at a rate of more than 50 percent of that to which he would otherwise be entitled unless he continues to be a citizen of the United States.

Part II: Apportionment of pension

Section 421: Provides that in a case of a veteran receiving pension, who for a period of 3 months shall desert his wife, she being a woman of good moral character and in necessitous circumstances, or his minor or helpless child or children, the benefits, not to exceed that payable for total disability shall be apportioned as follows:

(1) Wife but no child, 70 percent to veteran and 30 percent to wife.

(2) Wife and one child, 60 percent to veteran and 40 percent to wife, or if the child is not in her care and custody, 20 percent to the wife and 20 percent to the child.

(3) Wife and two children, 55 percent to the veteran and 45 percent to the wife, or if one or more of the children are not in her care and custody, 20 percent to the wife and 25 percent for the children, equally divided.

(4) Wife and three or more children, 50 percent to the veteran and 50 percent to the wife, or if one or more of the children are not in her care and custody, 20 percent for the wife and 30 percent for the children, equally divided.

(5) No wife, one child, 80 percent to veteran and 20 percent to child.

(6) No wife, two children, 70 percent to veteran and 30 percent to children, equally divided.

(7) No wife, three or more children, 65 percent to veteran and 35 percent to children, equally divided.

Section 422: (a) Provides that in a case of a veteran receiving pension in excess of $12 per month and is being maintained in an institution under the supervision of the United States or any political subdivision thereof, whether the residence therein is voluntary or involuntary, his pension shall not exceed 25 percent of that to which he would otherwise be entitled, in no case more than 25 percent of what he would be entitled were he totally disabled, and in no case is he to be reduced below $12 per month.

(b) Provides that in such case he has a lawful wife (she being a woman of good moral character), a child or children, or a dependent father or mother, the difference, not to exceed rate payable to such dependents were the veteran dead, be paid as follows (except as provided in sections 423 and 424 of this part):

(1) If there is a wife and no child, or wife and one or more children all in her care and custody, 100 percent to the wife.

(2) If there is a wife and one child not in her care and custody, 70 percent to the wife and 30 percent to the child.

(3) If there is a wife and two children, one or both of whom are not in the care and custody of the wife, 60 percent for the wife and 40 percent for the children, equally divided.

(4) If there is a wife and three or more children, one or more of whom are not in the care and custody of the wife, 50 percent for the wife and 50 percent for the children, equally divided.

(5) If there be no wife but one child, 100 percent to the child.

(6) If there be no wife but two or more children, 100 percent to the children, equally divided.

Section 423: Provides that if it be shown that the wife has abandoned her children by the veteran or that she is an unsuitable person to have care and custody of them apportionment shall be made to them the same as if there were no lawful wife, or if apportionment has been made to her this section to take effect from the date of last payment to her.

Section 424: Provides that no apportionment shall be made for any child that has been adopted by another person.

Section 425: Provides that the application of section 421 or 422 results in undue hardship upon the veteran or any of his dependents and relief from such hardship can be afforded without undue hardship to the other dependents, the Secretary may fix the amount to be apportioned under said sections.

Part III: Payments to minors and incompetents

Section 431: Authorizes the Secretary to make payment to guardian in case of a minor or other person who has been declared to be incompetent or to other person legally vested with the care of the beneficiary, to refuse payment to any guardian not properly discharging his duties, or, in case no guardian has been appointed, to determine who is otherwise legally vested with the care of the beneficiary or his estate.

Section 432: Authorizes the Secretary, in case of any guardian not faithfully executing the duties of his trust, to make presentation of the matter to the court which appointed such guardian, and to suspend payments to any guardian who neglects or refuses, after reasonable notice, to render an account to the Secretary from time to time showing manner of disbursements of moneys received.

Section 433: (a) Authorizes the Secretary to incur necessary expenses incident to the investigation or removal of any guardian of a beneficiary.

(b) Authorizes the Attorney General to incur necessary court costs incident to having incompetent veterans committed to departmental hospitals for treatment or domiciliary purposes.

(c) Authorizes the Attorney General to incur necessary expenses for the appointment of guardians for incompetent or minor beneficiaries where to charge the estate of such incompetent or minor would unduly deplete such estate.

Section 434: (a) Provides that money withheld and not paid prior to the death of the beneficiary can be paid after death only as provided in section 451 of this act.

(b) Any funds in the hands of the guardian, derived from pension, at the time of death of the beneficiary shall escheat to the United States.

Section 435: Provides that special examinations be made not less than once every 6 months in order to secure strict enforcement of the provisions of this act relative to payment of benefits for incompetents, except where the beneficiary is being maintained in a Bureau facility.

Part IV: Commencement, discontinuance, suspension, and recommencement of pension payments

Section 441: (a) Provides that the date of commencement of pension, unless otherwise expressly provided, shall be the date of filing a valid application in the department. Award of pension in a veteran's case not effective prior to discharge from the service or in a dependent's case if executed prior to the death of the veteran.

(b) Provides that the date of commencement of increase of pension on account of increased disability shall be the date of the examining surgeon's certificate showing such increased disability, and the date of commencement of increase on account of age shall be the date on which the beneficiary attains the beneficial age.

Section 442: (a) Provides that reduction or discontinuance of a veteran's pension shall be effective the first day of the month next following the month in which the approval is made, except as otherwise provided.

(b) Provides that discontinuance on account of death shall be the date of death in all cases.

(c) Provides that discontinuance of pension because of remarriage of a widow shall be the date of her remarriage.

(d) Provides that the discontinuance or reduction of pension because of a child reaching the age of 18 years, or being married or recovering from helplessness shall be effective the date next preceding the 18th birthday, the date of marriage, or the date of the surgeon's certificate of such recovery, as the case may be.

(e) Provides that where fraud is shown by or with the knowledge of the applicant the date of discontinuance shall be effective as of the effective date of the award.

(f) Provides that discontinuance of pension because of receipt of active-service or retirement pay shall be effective as of the date next preceding the date of commencement of such pay.

(g) Provides that discontinuance of pension upon proof of existence of a person presumed to be dead under section 554 (b) of this act shall be effective as of the date of determination in the Department of such fact.

(h) Provides that in the case of a mother receiving pension with a child, dies or remarries, the date of commencement of pension for the child shall be the date next succeeding the date of death or remarriage.

(i) Provides that when the rate, commencement, and continuance of pension allowed by special act are fixed by such act, they shall not be subject to variance by this act, but when not thus fixed the rate and continuance shall be subject to variance in accordance with the provisions of this act, and its commencement shall date from the passage of the special act; and in case it be shown that fraud was perpetrated in obtaining such special act, the Secretary shall suspend payment until the propriety of repealing the same can be considered by Congress.

Section 443: (a) Provides that pension payable to a widow (including a remarried widow) shall terminate on her death or remarriage, except as otherwise provided in this section.

(b) Provides that pension of a widow based on service in the War with Spain (including China Relief Expedition and Philippine Insurrection) or the World War when barred or terminated by reason of remarriage it shall not thereafter be commenced or recommenced.

(c) Provides that the open and notorious adulterous cohabitation of a widow or remarried widow of a veteran shall bar her title to pension as such, or, if a pensioner, to terminate her pension from the beginning of such cohabitation, and pension to such widow or remarried widow shall not commence or recommence until after a satisfactory showing of exemplary moral conduct for 5 years prior to the filing of a claim for restoration of rights.

(d) Provides that the remarried widow of a Civil War or Indian campaign veteran (except one eligible only under sec. 143 (a) (4) of this act) shall be entitled to pension under this act, regardless of the number of times she has remarried since the death of the veteran, without proving his death due to his service, if it be shown that each subsequent marriage has been dissolved by the death of the husband or by divorce on any ground except adultery on the part of the wife.

Section 444: Provides that in the event a veteran is survived by a widow entitled to pension, and a child or children by such widow, and it is shown that she has abandoned such child or children or that she is an unsuitable person to have their care and custody, no pension shall be payable to such widow until such child or children are no longer eligible for pension under this act, and the pension shall be payable to such child or children in the same manner and from the same date as if no widow survived, except, that if pension has been paid to the widow, the pension for the child or children shall commence with the day after the period covered by the last payment to the widow.

Section 445: (a) Provides that pension to a dependent father or mother shall continue during dependency or until death or remarriage, whether the dependency arises prior to or subsequent to the death of the veteran; and in the case of conflicting claims between a natural parent and a parent by adoption, the pension shall be payable to the natural parent unless it be shown that such natural parent abandoned the veteran during infancy or was declared by a court of competent jurisdiction an unsuitable person to have the care and custody of the veteran during his infancy. Remarriage of father to mother not a bar under this act.

(b) Provides that pension to or for a child shall continue only until the day before the child's eighteenth birthday, the date of marriage, recovery, or death.

Part V: Payment, receipt, and recapture of pension; issuance, delivery, and cancellation of pension checks

Section 451: (a) Provides for payment of pension accrued during lifetime to be paid upon death as follows:

(1) First, to his widow; second, if there is no widow, to his child or children.

(2) In case of a widow, to her children.

(3) In case of an apportionee, to the veteran.

(b) Provides that in the event that no person is entitled to the accrued pension by reason of relationship as set forth in subsection (a) no part of it shall be paid except so much as may be necessary to reimburse the person who bore the expenses of the last sickness and funeral of the beneficiary. Claim, therefore, must be filed within 1 year after the death of the beneficiary and completed within 6 months after call for evidence by the department.

Section 452: Provides that in a case wherein the veteran having no dependent is insane and is being maintained in an institution by the United States, and his estate derived from pension or other allowance or allowances by the United States exceeds $1,500, such allowance shall be discontinued until his estate is reduced to $500.

Section 453: (a) Provides that in the event more than one person is drawing pension and one of them dies or remarries, the pension for the remaining shall be the same as if they had been the sole original beneficiaries.

(b) Provides that not more than one pension shall be paid to any individual covering the same period; that in case an individual is entitled to more than one pension payment shall be made of the one granting the greater benefit. Allowances under section 4756 and 4757 of the Revised Statutes to be considered to be pensions.

(c) Prohibits allowance and payment of pension under this act to any officer, noncommissioned officer, or enlisted man in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard, either on the active or retired list.

(d) Prohibits a person receiving a pension under a special act from receiving a pension in addition thereto under this act, unless the special act expressly states that the pension granted thereby is in addition to any other pension to which such person is entitled under this act or any other act.

(e) Prohibits the recovery of overpayments to any person who, in the judgment of the secretary, was without fault, and where, in his judgment, such recovery would defeat the purpose of benefits otherwise authorized or would be against equity and good conscience, and absolves disbursing officers from liability where recovery is waived under this section.

(f) Prohibits the withholding of pension payable under this act from any beneficiary who is in arrears.

(g) Fixes minimum rate of pension for disability at $7, and for death at $12 per month.

(h) Exempts benefits payable under this act from taxation, attachment, seizure, or levy by or under any process whatsoever, but provides that it shall be subject to any claim the United States may have, except as provided in subsection (e) of this section.

Section 454: (a) Provides that payment of pension be made monthly on the last day of each month, by check, without separate voucher or receipt, except as provided in section 435 of this act, except in any case in which the secretary may consider a voucher necessary for the protection of the United States; such checks to be transmitted by mail to the last known address of the payee; prohibits postal employees from delivering any such mail if the addressee has died or removed, or, in the case of a widow believed by the postal employee to have remarried. In any such case the postmaster is required to return such mail with a statement of the reasons for such return, and provides that checks thus returned because of death or remarriage shall be canceled, except as provided in subsection (b) of this section.

(b) Provides that the mailing of a check to the last known address shall constitute payment in the event of the death or remarriage of the pensioner on or after the last day of the period covered by such check, which shall not be canceled but shall, in case of death, become an asset of the estate of the deceased, except as provided in section 434 of this act, and in case of remarriage shall be delivered to the pensioner upon satisfactory proof of the date of remarriage.

(c) Provides that checks properly issued to any beneficiary and undelivered for any reason shall be retained in the files of the disbursing officer until such time as delivery may be accomplished, or until 3 years have elapsed after the date of issuance of the first undelivered check, and after that period no check shall be issued except upon a new application, and payments under such application shall commence from the date of filing such application.

TITLE V: ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

Part I: Administrative powers, functions, and procedure

Section 501: (a) Authorizes and directs the Secretary to provide for medical examinations of applicants, to appoint surgeons or physicians to make such examinations, to pay fees therefor, and in case of examination necessarily made at the home of the applicant such mileage or expense as he deems reasonable.

(b) Authorizes and directs the Secretary, within 1 year, to provide for the adjudication and making of ratings in claims for pension solely in the central office and, so far as practicable, the application of the procedure in use by the Bureau of Pensions, Department of the Interior, prior to July 3, 1930, to such ratings and adjudications.

(c) Authorizes the Secretary, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to make payment for official telephone service and rental in the field wherever incurred in case of official telephones for medical officers and the head officers of any branch office, suboffice, or facility of the Department, where such telephones are installed in private residence, apartment, or quarters.

Section 502: (a) Authorizes the Secretary to delegate authority to render decisions under this act to such person or persons as he may find necessary, and provides that decisions rendered by such person or persons within the limitations of such delegation of authority shall have the same effect as though rendered personally by the Secretary.

(b) Provides that any decision (except as to yearly renewable term insurance or Government life insurance) rendered or approved by the Secretary under the provisions of this act, and the regulations issued pursuant thereto, shall be final and conclusive on all questions of law and fact, and no other official or court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to review, by mandamus or otherwise, any such decision.

Section 503: (a) Authorizes the Secretary and such persons as he shall designate in writing to apply to any United States court to issue subpoena for and compel the attendance of any witness being within the jurisdiction of such court before any officer of the court or any person from the Bureau designated or detailed under subsection (b) of this section, to be examined orally or on written interrogatories, the production of books and papers or other documents within the jurisdiction of the court; and in case of contumacy or refusal to obey such subpoena the judge of the court may punish such offense in like manner as any court of the United States may do in case of process of subpoena ad testificandum; and that witnesses so required to attend shall be allowed and paid the same fees and mileage as are paid witnesses in the district courts of the United States.

(b) Authorizes the Secretary to detail clerks or persons employed in the Department to make special examinations into the merits of claims, whether pending or adjudicated, as he may deem proper; to aid applicants in the preparation of their claims; to investigate any suspected attempt at fraud and to aid in the prosecution of anyone appearing to be guilty of fraud in the preparation or presentation of claims for pension; to grant authority to such detailed persons to administer oaths in connection with their work and to employ stenographers when deemed necessary by the Secretary in important cases, and to pay them such additional compensation as he may deem necessary.

(c) Authorizes the Secretary, upon request, to detail one clerk to each legislative committee of Congress having jurisdiction over legislation relating to pensions or monetary benefits to veterans.

Section 504: (a) Provides that claims for benefits under this act shall be filed with the Department in such form as the Secretary shall approve, and shall be sworn to before an officer authorized by law to administer oaths for general purposes or any person authorized by this act to administer oaths.

(b) Provides that in case an application is not complete at time of original submission the Secretary shall notify the applicant of the evidence necessary to complete the application, and that if such evidence is not received within 1 year of date of request, therefore no pension shall be payable by virtue of such application.

(c) Requires that briefs of determinations containing signed endorsements in ink of determination or adjudications be kept attached to each application and papers relating thereto.

Section 505: (a) Authorizes and directs the Secretary, for the purposes of part I of title I and for the purpose of title II, to adopt and apply a schedule of ratings based, as far as practicable, on the average impairment of earning capacity in civil occupations. The schedule to provide 10 grades of disability and no more upon which payment of pension shall be based, namely, 10 percent, 20 percent, 30 percent, 40 percent, 50 percent, 60 percent, 70 percent, 80 percent, 90 percent, and 100 percent.

(b) Authorizes and directs the Secretary, for the purposes of parts III and V of title I of this act, to apply the schedule adopted under subsection (a) of this section except that he shall employ only the 50-percent and the 100-percent grades thereof, with an additional grade of 75 percent.

Part II: Appeals

Section 521: Provides for the establishment of a Board of Veterans' Appeals to be composed of a chairman, vice chairman, and not to exceed 15 associate members. Also provides for necessary professional, administrative, clerical, and stenographic personnel. Members of the board to be appointed by the Secretary.

Section 522: Provides that all questions on claims involving benefits within the jurisdiction of the Department shall be subject to review on appeal by the board, and when a claim has been disallowed by the board it may not thereafter be reopened and allowed except on new evidence from service department, and no new claim shall be considered except on new and material evidence. The board shall, in its decisions, be bound by the regulations prescribed by the Secretary.

Section 523: Provides that appeals, except in simultaneously contested claims, must be filed within year from the date of mailing notice of the original determination; that such appeals be filed with the head of the activity that entered the denial, who shall, within 90 days, consider and determine whether the action from which the appeal is taken shall be adhered to, and if he shall determine not to recede therefrom he shall, within the 90-day period, forward such appeal, together with the record in the case and a report stating his reasons for the action complained of, to the Secretary, and such appeal shall be entered upon a docket kept for that purpose, and the jurisdiction of the activity involved shall then cease and the matter shall be decided by the board. If no appeal is filed within the period specified the action taken on initial review shall become final, except where subsequent to such disallowance new and material evidence is furnished.

Section 524: (a) Provides that applications for review on appeal shall be made in writing and may be filed by the claimant, his guardian or duly authorized agent and that not more than one agent be recognized at any time in the prosecution of a claim.

(b) Requires that each appeal must show the name and service of the veteran on whose service the claim is based, as well as the number of the claim, the date of the action appealed from, and the benefit sought.

(c) Requires that each appeal shall contain specific assignment of error of law or mistake of fact in the adjudication of the claim, and provides that any appeal insufficient in this respect may be dismissed.

(d) Provides that an appeal shall not be considered unless it is prepared and filed in conformity with this part.

(e) Requires that the board shall maintain a docket, permits formal recorded hearings in exceptional cases only, and requires that cases be considered and decided in regular order according to their places on the docket, unless advanced on motion for earlier consideration by reason of involving interpretation of law of general application or for other sufficient cause shown.

Section 525: (a) Provides that in simultaneously contested claims, where one is allowed and the other rejected, the time for filing an appeal shall be within 60 days—except in case claimant resides in a foreign country or an outlying possession, 6 months—from date of mailing notice of the original action to the claimant to whom the action was adverse. In such cases the Secretary shall promptly notify all parties in interest of the original action taken, expressly calling attention to the fact that an appeal will not be entertained unless filed within the period prescribed in this section, such notices to be mailed to the parties in interest at the last-known address of record, and such mailing shall constitute sufficient evidence of notice.

(b) Directs that upon the filing of an appeal in simultaneously contested claims all parties, other than the appellant, whose interests may be adversely affected by the decision shall be notified of the substance thereof and allowed 30 days—except in case the party resides in a foreign country or an outlying district, 3 months—from the date of mailing such notice within which to file brief or argument in answer thereto before the papers are forwarded to the Board of Appeals; that the mailing of notices to the last-known address of record of the parties whose interest may be adversely affected shall constitute sufficient evidence of notice.

Part III: Records and reports

Section 531: (a) Provides that all files, records, reports, and other papers and documents pertaining to any claim, whether pending or adjudicated, shall be deemed confidential and privileged, and no disclosure thereof shall be made, except as follows:

(1) To a claimant or his duly authorized agent as to matters concerning himself alone when, in the judgment of the Secretary, such disclosure not be injurious to the physical or mental health of the claimant.

(2) When required by processes of a United States court.

(3) When required by any department or agency of the United States Government.

(4) In all proceedings in the nature of an inquest into the mental competency of the claimant.

(5) In any judicial proceedings when in the judgment of the Secretary such disclosure is deemed necessary and proper.

(b) That the amount of pension of any beneficiary shall be made known to any person who applies for such information, and the Secretary, upon determination that the public interest requires it, may, at any time and in any manner, publish any or all information of record pertaining to any or all claims.

(c) The Secretary may authorize an inspection of Department records by duly authorized representatives of recognized organizations upon written authority from the claimant.

Section 532: (a) Provides that any person desiring to obtain a copy of any record, paper, or document in the custody of the Department which may be disclosed under the provisions of section 531 must make written application therefor to the Department, stating specifically—

(1) The particular record, paper, or document a copy of which is desired;

(2) Whether certified or uncertified copy is desired; and

(3) The purpose for which the copy is to be used.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to fix a schedule of fees for copies and certifications of such records.

(c) Certified copies furnished under this part shall be admitted in evidence equally with the originals thereof.

Part IV: Attorneys, agents, and representatives

Section 541: Authorizes the Secretary to recognize representatives of the American Red Cross, the American Legion, the Disabled American Veterans, the Grand Army of the Republic, the United Spanish War Veterans, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and such other organizations as he shall approve, in the presentation of claims. No such representative to be recognized until a certificate has been filed in the Department, under such regulations as the Secretary may prescribe, certifying that no fee or compensation of whatsoever nature shall be charged veterans or the dependents of veterans for service rendered.

Section 542: (a) Authorizes the Secretary to recognize agents and attorneys in the presentation of claims and to prescribe regulations relative thereto. Such regulations may require that such attorneys and agents show that they are of good moral character and in good repute, possessed of the necessary qualifications to render such claimant valuable service and otherwise competent to advise and assist applicants in the presentation of their claims. Forbids the recognition as an attorney or agent of any person who (1) has been an officer or employee of the Bureau within 2 years or when the claim was pending, or (2) is an officer or employee, appointive or elective, of any organization whose representatives are recognized under section 541 of this act, who transacts business relating to any such claim from or at an office, from or at which any such organization carries on its work incident to presenting claims, or who uses the stationery of any such organization in transacting business relating to any such claim. Such regulation to contain a provision requiring the filing in each claim a power of attorney in such manner and form as the Secretary shall prescribe. Forbids the payment of a fee to any person not recognized as an agent or attorney under this section.

(b) Authorizes the Secretary to suspend or exclude from further practice before the Department any agent or attorney, for cause, after hearing.

(c) Authorizes the Secretary to determine and pay fees in pension claims, to prescribe regulations governing the award, the amount and mode of payment of such fees and the deduction thereof from the pension, and provides that where duplicate fee agreements are filed a fee not in excess of $25 may be paid, and if no such agreements are filed the fee shall not exceed $10 and in no case shall a fee be allowed except on the rendition of material service; authorizes the Secretary to prescribe the form of articles of agreement for such fee.

Part V: Definitions and construing provisions

Section 551: (a) The definitions set forth in this part shall be applicable when used in this act, unless the context otherwise requires.

(b) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Veterans' Affairs, and the term "Department" means the Department of Veterans' Affairs.

(c) The term "pension" when used in part III of title III and in parts I, II, and III of title IV of this act shall include "emergency officers' retirement pay" and "compensation" and the term "pensioner" shall include any person receiving compensation or emergency officers' retirement pay.

(d) The term "military or naval service" includes the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, and the Coast Guard on and after July 2, 1930; and the Naval Reserves, the National Naval Volunteers, the State militia, and the Coast Guard prior to July 2, 1930, while serving pursuant to law with the Army or Navy in time of war or national emergency.

(e) The term "person who served" and the term "veteran" both include—

(1) Any person, whether male or female and whether commissioned, enlisted, enrolled, or drafted, who was finally accepted for active service in the military or naval service of the United States;

(2) Any member of a training camp authorized by law;

(3) Any other person heretofore recognized by statute in force on the date of enactment of this act as having a pensionable status; and

(d) In the case of service in any war (including the Philippine Insurrection, China Relief Expedition, any Indian campaign, and any military expedition or military occupation), any officer, enlisted man, member of the Army Nurse Corps (female), member of the Navy Nurse Corps (female), any woman who served as a contract nurse, and any individual who served overseas as a contract surgeon of the Army.

(f) The term "widow" means a woman who was lawfully married to a veteran, thereafter deceased, and, except for cases provided for in subsection (b) and (d) of section 443, who has not remarried since his death.

(g) In the case of the Civil War or an Indian campaign, the term "remarried widow" means a woman who was lawfully married to a veteran, thereafter deceased, who subsequently remarried and is again a widow by the death or divorce of the subsequent husband or husbands.

Section 552: (a) Provides that an injury or disease or a preexisting disease or injury will be deemed to have been incurred or aggravated "in line of duty" when the person on whose account benefits are claimed was, at the time the injury or disease was incurred or aggravated, in the active military or naval service, whether on active duty or on authorized leave for a period of time which did not materially interfere with the performance of his regular routine of duty, except where the incurrence or aggravation was due to misconduct on his part, unless at the time of the incurrence or aggravation the person was absent from his organization or other post of duty on a furlough or leave of absence which materially interfered with the performance of regular routine of duty; was confined under sentence of court martial or civil court or was resisting lawful arrest; was relieved from all active performance of duty by command of his superior officer as a result of intemperate use of drugs or alcoholic liquor, or because of injury or disease due to his misconduct; was acting in disobedience of lawful orders of his superior officer or in violation of the rules and regulations of his organization; or, whether at his post or lawfully absent, if the injury or disease or aggravation was caused by something not involving misconduct but done in pursuing some private business or avocation.

(b) When the incurrence or aggravation of a disease or injury is suffered while on leave, the burden of proof shall be on the claimant to show that it was in line of duty.

Section 553 directs that a disability due to venereal disease shall be held to be not in line of duty, unless it be shown that it was not due to illicit sexual intercourse, and any disability due to an act of omission or commission, wrong in itself, or one opposed to the principles of good morals, or when due to gross negligence, gross carelessness, alcoholism, drug addiction, or self-infliction of wounds shall be held to be not in line of duty.

Section 554: (a) Provides that in any claim for benefits under this act marriage shall be proven to be legal marriage according to the law of the place where the parties resided at the time of marriage or at the time the right to the benefit claimed accrued.

(b) Provides that for the purpose of this act the death of a veteran shall be considered as sufficiently proved if satisfactory evidence is produced establishing the fact of the continued and unexplained absence of such veteran from his home and family for a period of 7 years, during which period no intelligence of his existence shall have been received.

Section 555 provides that the term "departmental facilities" as used in this act shall include the following:

(a) Any facility over which the department has direct and exclusive jurisdiction;

(b) Any other Government facility for which the Secretary may deem necessary to contract.

(c) Any private facility for which the Secretary may deem it necessary and proper to contract in order to provide hospital care in emergency cases; for women veterans of any war; and for veterans of any war in the territories and possessions.

Section 556 requires that the provisions of this act shall be construed without reference to any prior interpretation of any act, any part of an act, or any Executive order which is reenacted in this act, or appears in similar language in this act, expressed or implied in or by any order, regulation, rule, decision, determination, adjudication, or otherwise.

TITLE VI: MISCELLANEOUS

Part I: Penalties

Section 601 provides maximum penalty of $5,000 fine or 2 years' imprisonment, or both, for making a false affidavit, knowingly, in any claim.

Section 602: Provides maximum penalty of $2,000 fine or 1 year imprisonment, or both, where a person has title to pension which is terminated by the happening of a contingency and who continues to accept payments.

Section 603: Provides maximum penalty of $2,000 fine or 1 year imprisonment, or both, for accepting any money, check, or pension, without being entitled to it, and with intent to defraud the United States or any beneficiary of the United States.

Section 604: Provides maximum penalty of $1,000 fine or imprisonment for 1 year, or both, for in any way aiding in the making or presentation of any false statement concerning any claim for benefits under this act, and in addition to all other penalties prescribed forfeits all rights to benefits under this act.

Section 605: Provides a maximum penalty of $1,000 fine or 5 years imprisonment, or both, for forging an endorsement on a pension check or uttering such check knowing that the endorsement is forged or for falsely personating the rightful owner of any such check, obtain all or any part of the amount represented by such check.

Section 606: Provides maximum penalty of $2,000 fine or 5 years imprisonment, or both, in case of anyone in a fiduciary capacity who embezzles benefits paid under the provisions of this act.

Section 607: Provides a maximum penalty of $2,000 fine or 1 year in prison, or both, in case of any person collecting fees for services in presentation of claims under this act, other than may be authorized under section 542 of this act.

Section 608: Provides a maximum fine of $500 or maximum 2 years imprisonment, or both, in case of any person who demands, receives, or retains any compensation for services in securing the introduction or passage of a bill by Congress granting pension or increase of pension.

Part II: Joint congressional committee on veterans' affairs

Section 621: Provides for the establishment of a joint congressional committee to be composed of the chairman and the ranking majority and minority members of the Committees of the House on Invalid Pensions, Pensions, and World War Legislation and of the Committees of the Senate on Finance and Pensions, and of the subcommittees of the House and Senate Committees on Appropriations for the Department of Veterans' Affairs.

Section 622: Fixes the duties of the joint committee, as follows:

(1) To investigate the operation and effects of the Federal system of benefits to veterans and their dependents.

(2) To investigate the administration of the pension laws by the Secretary or any department, establishment, or agency charged with their administration.

(3) To investigate measures and methods for the simplification of pension laws and their administration.

(4) To report from time to time to the committee of the House and Senate having legislative jurisdiction over pensions and other benefits the results of their investigations, together with such recommendations as it may deem advisable.

Section 623: (a) Directs that the joint committee shall meet as soon as practicable and elect a chairman and vice chairman from among its members, and empowers it to appoint and fix the compensation of a clerk and such other clerical, expert, and stenographical assistants as it deems advisable.

(b) Ten members shall constitute a quorum, but not less than four members of each House.

(c) Authorizes the joint committee, or any subcommittee thereof, to hold hearings and sit and act at such places and times, in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, whether or not Congress is in session, to issue subpoenas, administer oaths, and require the production of books, papers, and documents, and incur expense of printing and binding.

(d) Subpoenas to be issued over the signature of the chairman or vice chairman and served by any person designated by him. Extends the provisions of sections 101, 102, 103, and 104 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 2, secs. 191, 192, 193, and 194) in case of a subpoena.

(e) Provides that members shall not receive compensation, other than as Members of Congress, except that they shall be reimbursed for necessary expenses incurred by them other than expenses incurred by them in connection with meetings held in the District of Columbia during such time as Congress is in session.

(f) Provides for one-half of the expenses from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House.

Part III: Emergency officers' retirement pay

Section 631: Provides that any person who, first, served as an officer of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the World War, other than as officer of the Regular Army, Navy, or Marine Corps during the World War; second, entered active service between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918; third, made valid application for retirement under the provisions of the Emergency Officers' Retirement Act of May 24, 1928 (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 38, ch. 10A); and fourth, prior to the passage of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, was granted retirement with pay, shall, subject to such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary pursuant to this act, be entitled to continue to receive retirement pay at the monthly rate being paid him on March 19, 1933, if the disability for which he has been retired with pay resulted from disease or injury or aggravation of a preexisting disease or injury, incurred in line of duty during such service and is shown to have proper rating prior to March 20, 1933, and if the disease or injury directly resulted from the performance of military or naval duty.

Part IV: Army and Navy medal of honor roll

Section 641: (a) Provides for in the War and Navy Departments a medal of honor roll to be composed of the name of each surviving person who has attained or shall hereafter attain the age of 50 years, who served in the military or naval forces of the United States in any war (including the Philippine Insurrection, China Relief Expedition, any Indian campaign, military expedition or military occupation), who has been awarded a medal of honor by reason of gallantry of intrepidity at the risk of his life above and beyond the call of duty, and who was honorably released from service by muster out, resignation, retirement, or otherwise; fixes the mode of procedure to have named places on said roll and that rank in service shall not be considered in applications hereunder.

(b) Directs that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall, according to the service rendered, furnish each person whose name appears on said roll, a certificate showing the act or acts for which the medal of honor was awarded and a verified copy of each, except where the service was terminated by retirement, to the Secretary of Veterans' Affairs, which shall be his warrant for allowing the extra pension provided in section 124 of this act.

(c) Repeals act of April 27, 1916.

Part V: Insurance

Section 651: Prohibits additional payments of insurance under sections 305 and 309 of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, or the third proviso of section 408 of the War Risk Insurance Act, as amended, except those persons actually receiving payments on the date of the enactment of this act, or in those claims where, prior to the date of enactment of this act, it has been determined by the Veterans' Administration that all or parts of the insurance is payable under such sections and the interested person or persons entitled thereto have been informed of such determination, and fixes the order of preference of relatives entitled to unpaid installments of a beneficiary who dies while receiving insurance payments.

Section 652: Prohibits the granting of any United States Government life insurance under the provisions of title III of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, after the date of enactment of this act, except pursuant to such provision relating to reinstatement or conversion.

Part VI: Repeals and saving provisions

Section 661: (a) Acts or parts of acts, as amended, are hereby repealed, except such acts or parts of acts as relate to yearly renewable term insurance or Government life insurance, which shall continue in force and effect insofar as they relate to such insurance:

(1) Title I of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, as amended.

(2) Section 20 of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1934, approved June 16, 1933.

(3) Title III of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1935.

(4) The act entitled "An act to compensate widows and children of persons who died while receiving monetary benefits for disabilities directly incurred in or aggravated by active military or naval service in the World War", approved June 28, 1934.

(5) The World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended.

(6) Sections 470 to 474, both inclusive, 1639, 1656, 1657, and sections 4692 to 4791, both inclusive (except sec.

4751 to 4763, both inclusive), as amended, of the Revised Statutes.

(7) Miscellaneous administrative provisions of the pension laws: Act of July 25, 1882 (U. S. C., title 38, secs. 29, 71, 124); act of March 13, 1896 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. 32); act of July 26, 1892 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. 42); act of May 28, 1903 (U. S. C., title 38, secs. 48, 72, 113, 125); act of August 17, 1912 (U. S. C., title 38, secs. 50, 51, 52, 128); act of December 21, 1893 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. 56); act of June 21, 1879 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. 57); act of July 18, 1894 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. 73); act of March 3, 1879 (U. S. C., title 38, secs. 92, 93); act of June 7, 1888 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. 94); act of March 2, 1895 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. 96); act of March 3, 1905 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. 97); act of July 4, 1884 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. 115); act of March 3, 1891 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. 122); act of March 3, 1875 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. 123).

(8) Indian war pension laws: Act of July 27, 1892 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. —); act of February 3, 1893 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. —); act of June 27, 1902 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. —); act of April 19, 1908 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. —); act of May 30, 1908 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. —); act of February 19, 1913 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. —); act of March 4, 1917 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. —); act of September 1, 1922 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. —); act of May 21, 1926 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. —); act of March 3, 1927 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. —).

(10) Spanish-American War pension laws: Act of July 16, 1918 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. —); act of June 5, 1920 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. —); act of September 1, 1922 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. —); act of May 1, 1926 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. —); act of June 2, 1930 (U. S. C., title 38, sec. —).

(b) Repeals all other acts and parts of acts inconsistent or in conflict with the provisions of this act.

(c) Provides that all offenses committed and all penalties incurred under the acts or parts of acts repealed by this section may be prosecuted and punished in the same manner and with the same effect as if such act or parts of acts had not been repealed, and any person who forfeited rights to benefits under any such acts or parts of acts shall not be entitled to benefits under this act.

Section 662: (a) Ratifies, except for fraud, mistake, or error, adjudications made under laws in force prior to the date of enactment of this act, and the further exception of men who are drawing pension or compensation based on the service of their wives; prohibits increasing or decreasing such rates under the provisions of the laws repealed.

(b) Provides that claims pending at the date of enactment of this act shall be adjudicated under the laws applicable and payments made at the rates provided in such laws; that in the event the claim is not complete the Secretary shall notify the applicant of the evidence necessary to complete the claim—if applicant had not been previously notified—and if such evidence is not received within 1 year from the date of such notice benefits shall not be paid by virtue of such claim; and provides further that benefits awarded under such claims shall not be allowed for any period prior to 1 year preceding the date of enactment of this act, and that all claims filed on or after the enactment of this act shall be adjudicated under the provisions of this act.

(c) Permits any person to relinquish pension, compensation, or emergency officers' retirement pay being paid, or being applied for in a claim pending at the date of enactment of this act under laws in effect prior to such date, and claim and, if eligible, receive pension under the provisions of this act.

Section 663: Provides that this act shall take effect on the 1st day of the calendar month next following the month during which this act is enacted, except in cases otherwise expressly provided for in this act.

Section 664: Provides that this act may be cited as the "Uniform Pensions Act, 1935."

FARMERS' CONVENTION

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I was very much impressed this morning by the very large attendance of farmers throughout the Nation at Constitution Hall. The thing that impressed me more than anything else about this meeting was that this large group, representing some thirty or thirty-five million of our population, are here not in protest but in approval of the farm-relief laws which have been passed during President Roosevelt's administration and which have favorably affected this group. I could not help but contrast this great group and their approval with various other groups which come to our National Capital in denunciation of the Congress and the things which the Congress has tried to do for the American people.

The A. A. A. and other farm-relief measures which have passed since President Roosevelt's inauguration have not only restored hope and confidence in the breasts of the American farmers but have redounded great benefits to our entire Nation.

The plan of the program has all along been to reestablish purchasing power in the hands of the American farmer and indeed to give him cost of production plus a reasonable profit. Cost of production and a reasonable profit have, directly and indirectly, been assured to the various industries of our country for many years; in fact, the industrial centers and the special interests of our Nation have fared well in the past in the matter of legislation favorably affecting their various groups and blocs, but until President Roosevelt's inauguration the farmer of our Nation was indeed the "forgotten man." Year after year his profits dwindled and his operating costs increased until he was producing at a loss and mortgages were over millions of the farms in our Nation. Without the rescue brought to the farmer through the administration, bankruptcy faced them from Maine to California and from Oregon to Florida.

Although the prices of farm commodities have been increased to the consumer, yet such increase was essential if the farmers were to be able to continue production. The industrial centers of our country, particularly New England, are indeed short-sighted when they make vicious attacks against the cotton-processing tax and other legislation which has meant the very existence of the farmers of the South and West. If these industrial centers should persist in their drive against the farmers of our Nation, and be successful in their efforts, they will "kill the goose that lays the golden eggs" and will find the remainder of their spindles idle and their various other factories entirely out of operation. After all, our Nation is one, indivisible and inseparable. If the livelihood, investment, and industries of 35,000,000 farmers of our Nation are destroyed, chaos will face the entire Nation. That which adversely affects one section of our country, or one class of our Nation, economically and indirectly, affects the entire Nation. When the farmers of our Nation profit and have a purchasing power, the entire country profits and the wheels of industry begin to turn.

During the Roosevelt administration shipments of goods in the 10 States of the Southeast, which are all agricultural States in our Union, increased almost 58 percent. Shipments are said to have increased from 115,649,678 pounds to 182,308,112 pounds. This tonnage originated in the industrial States. It was there manufactured and shipped to the States of the Southeast. This could not have obtained without the increased purchasing power of these States through President Roosevelt's general farm-relief program. The shipment of stoves and heaters alone increased from 6,251,271 to 11,481,799 pounds, which was an increase of 83 percent. Refrigerator shipments increased from 4,629,050 to 11,512,361 pounds, which was an increase of 148 percent. Shipments of matches increased from 3,090,632 to 7,973,280 pounds, and practically all of the manufactured articles which, mind you, are manufactured in our industrial centers of the Midwest and East increased to a great degree. This great purchasing power of the Southeast was made possible largely through the cash income from crops and benefit payments in these States, which increased from $451,637,000 in the year July 1, 1932, through June 30, 1933, to $722,017,000 for the year July 1, 1933, through June 30, 1934. The purchasing power of these States and other farm States has been greatly increased through the Government's refinancing program through which millions of dollars have been loaned to liquidate farm indebtedness and to liquidate it at a lower rate of interest.

I congratulate the farmers of our Nation for converging on Washington in approval of the new deal's farm-relief program, and pledge my further best efforts for a full realization of every benefit embraced in the general relief program. Insofar as I know, no other group so representative of America has ever appeared in Washington in demonstration and approval. This patriotic move is convincing that the farmers of our Nation are the very foundation of democracy and our great institutions. [Applause.]

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there will be further general debate today, and can the gentleman not come in under the general debate?

Mr. RICH. I should like to have the time now, if the gentleman please.

Mr. LUDLOW. I shall not object to this request, but I wish to serve notice that we cannot allow anyone else to come in now.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he will answer the questions that were propounded to him yesterday and which he refused to answer and did not answer?

Mr. RICH. If the gentleman will get me additional time, I shall certainly answer the gentleman, and show what the A. A. A. is doing to this country.

Mr. TRUAX. Five minutes is enough time for the gentleman to answer the questions.

Mr. RICH. I have another matter that I want to call to the gentleman's attention this morning, and it may be something that is vitally important to him.

Mr. TRUAX. Then I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I read this article in the papers this morning:

HOUSE TYPEWRITERS TAKEN BY MEMBERS, TRIMBLE COMPLAINS

The trouble, says South Trimble, House clerk, is that a lot of the men who write the laws don't know what's in them when it comes to taking off Government typewriters.

Typewriters are furnished to Members of the House for their offices.

Testifying before the House Appropriations Committee, Trimble said:

"The biggest trouble we have with typewriters is due to the fact that Members do not know the law on the subject and send them home. There ought to be some steps taken to stop that. It is against the law to take typewriters out of the House Office Building."

Mr. Speaker, I want to say to you and to the Membership of this House that the public of the United States do not know who these thieves are and they may think it is you or me and I think the time has come when South Trimble, the Clerk of the House, whose duty it is to know where these typewriters are, should tell the people of the country who is stealing these typewriters. He should come in here with a list of the names of the Members of the House who are stealing these typewriters, so that the public may know who they are, and I may say to the Membership of the House that the way it is now we are all incriminated unless South Trimble makes public a list of the men who have stolen these typewriters. I do not care whether they are Republicans or whether they are Democrats, whether they are from the North or whether they are from the South, whether it is the Speaker of the House or whether it is one of the lowliest Members of the House, I think the time is here when public officials, whose responsibility it is to guard and protect the property of this country, should come out flat-footed and give the names of these thieves, whether they be Senators, Representatives, or any Government employee. They are nothing but thieves who are stealing typewriters from the Federal Government and they should be punished.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado, Mr. LUDLOW, and Mr. BLANTON rose.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I cannot yield to all of these gentlemen at once.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I would like to ask the gentleman what is the gender of these typewriters. The gentleman has been talking about typewriters for 5 minutes and we do not know whether they are feminine or neuter typewriters.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman comes from Colorado, and I do not know whether they make typewriters out there or not, but I may say to the gentleman that it is an instrument with so many keys on it alphabetically arranged and is used for the purpose of writing letters. This is the kind of machine I am talking about. I am not talking about the individual who operates the machine, but I may say to the gentleman that if Members of Congress are stealing these machines they ought to be made to bring them back, and they should not incriminate you or incriminate me with such insinuations as I am demanding the names of the thieves, that they may be published in this Record.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman now yield to me?

Mr. RICH. I yield.

Mr. LUDLOW. I think the gentleman is doing a great injustice to Mr. Trimble. Mr. Trimble did not insinuate, and it was not in his mind to insinuate, that any Member of Congress was a thief; but his statement was that just through inadvertence and through a lack of familiarity with the law some Members have taken their typewriters home without any intention whatever of stealing Government property. I think this ought to be said in Mr. Trimble's behalf. He never once thought of insinuating that Members were deliberately stealing typewriters. His testimony is clear that he never had such a thought.

Mr. RICH. If you can read this article and then say that he did not mean that these Members of Congress were thieves, I do not understand the English language. Mr. Trimble knows what the law is and has the power to demand that Members of Congress bring these typewriters back, and I think he ought to do it. He has the power and authority to demand their return. They are property of the Government. Every man and woman in our country has an interest in them. And when a Member of Congress takes a typewriter home and refuses to return it, then it is simply thievery, and Mr. Trimble knows it, you know it, and I know it is thievery. So let us have the names published and take action to punish the offenders.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1384) entitled "An act to amend the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, to amend the Federal Farm Loan Act, to amend the Agricultural Marketing Act, to amend the Farm Credit Act of 1933, and for other purposes", requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two houses thereon, and appoints Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. WAGNER, Mr. BARKLEY, Mr. BYRNES, Mr. CAREY, and Mr. COUZENS to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in my extension of remarks in the Record I may include therein a résumé of my bill (H. R. 7375) known as the "uniform pension bill."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

THE FAVORABLE TAX POSITION OF WISCONSIN

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record and to include therein several brief tables.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Speaker, there have been numerous efforts to discredit the Wisconsin system and principles of taxation. Most of this unfounded propaganda would lead us to believe that the principles of taxation which have been and are being used in Wisconsin have resulted in driving industry out of the State.

The fact is that Wisconsin has enjoyed far greater industrial prosperity than have comparable States and that Wisconsin's tax and financial position is much more favorable than that of comparable States.

In order that Members of the House may have these facts available for ready reference and for the information of citizens of Wisconsin, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD several tables which have been prepared by the Wisconsin State Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee, Wis. This pamphlet is entitled "The Favorable Tax Position of Wisconsin", and is compiled from figures prepared by the United States Census Bureau, the Wisconsin Tax Commission, and the University of Wisconsin.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FROM 1932 UNITED STATES CENSUS BULLETINS

The Bureau of the Census of the United States Department of Commerce recently has released the financial statistics of State governments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, and including statistics for the counties, the cities, the villages, the school districts, the towns, and other local units of government for a fiscal year most nearly conforming to that of the State. The figures in the next three tables are taken from these statistics.

² The interest paid by Wisconsin on its total indebtedness is less than that paid by the other States. Also, the interest charges on the bonded indebtedness of the State of Wisconsin and all of its political subdivisions take a smaller percentage of the total taxes than they do in any competing State.

³ The ratio of the bonded debt to the tangible wealth is smaller in Wisconsin than it is in these other States.

⁴ Since June 30, 1932, the public indebtedness of Wisconsin has been reduced by an additional $4,737,955.

¹ "General property taxes" include real and personal property.

² "Special property taxes" are assessed by the tax commission and taxes are levied at the average State rate. These special property taxes include taxes paid by railroads, street railways, light, heat and power companies, sleeping car, express, telegraph, conservation and regulation companies.

³ "Other special taxes" include freight line, grain and coal occupational taxes, telephone, insurance, forest crop, oleomargarine, emergency chain store, malt beverages and liquors and boxing club taxes.

⁴ "Inheritance taxes" include inheritance, emergency transfer and emergency gift taxes.

¹⁰ At the beginning of the depression Wisconsin had a balance in the State Treasury of about $27,000,000. About $25,000,000 of this has been used for relief. The State also has dipped into its unappropriated State highway funds to the extent of about $17,000,000. This $42,000,000 was already available for relief and did not require additional taxes. The above figures on total revenue raised also include $7,485,078 in income taxes for unemployment relief, the total amount raised by the State for this purpose to date.

NOTE.—Three major factors must enter into any basic comparison of the cost of government as between States. They are current revenues, long-term or bonded indebtedness (spent currently), and current permanent improvements or outlays (assets), nonrecurring during the period of time for which a comparison is made. Hence the emphasis on these three major factors in current cost of government, as in tables I, II, and III.

KEY TO TESTS

1. Relative increase in total population, 1920 to 1930.
2. Relative increase in urban population, 1920 to 1930.
3. Relative increase in population of leading city, 1920 to 1930 (United States arbitrarily rated eighth).
4. Relative increase in per capita income, 1925 to 1930.
5. Relative decline in State income in 1930 from 1929.
6. Per capita income for last 3 years: 1928, 1929, and 1930, averaged.
7. Relative increase in Federal income-tax collections, 1925 to 1930.
8. Relative increase in net income of all corporations, 1923 to 1928.
9. Relative increase in net income of manufacturing corporations, 1923 to 1928.
10. Percent of business concerns failing in last 5 years, 1926 to 1930, inclusive.
11. Number of bank failures in last 5 years, 1926 to 1930, inclusive.
12. Relative increase in per capita wealth, 1922 to 1929.
13. Absolute increase in dollars in per capita wealth, 1922 to 1929.
14. Per capita life insurance in force in 1929.
15. Life insurance sales per capita, 1926 to 1930, inclusive.
16. Per capita savings deposits in all banks, 1930.
17. Relative increase in savings deposits in all banks, 1925 to 1930.
18. Per capita building construction in 5 years, 1926 to 1930, inclusive.
19. Per capita building construction in leading city, 1926 to 1930, inclusive.
20. Relative growth in production of electricity in central power stations, 1925 to 1930.
21. Relative increase in bank debits, 1925 to 1930 (United States rated as average of six States outside of New York).
22. Relative decline in bank debits in 1930 over 1929.
23. Relative increase in gross postal receipts, 1925 to 1930.
24. Relative increase in assets of building-and-loan associations, 1924 to 1929.
25. Relative increase in motor-vehicle registrations, 1925 to 1930.
26. Relative increase in value of manufactured products, 1925 to 1929.
27. Relative increase in value added by manufacture, 1925 to 1929.
28. Relative increase in wages paid in manufacturing, 1925 to 1929.
29. Relative increase in number of wage earners in manufacturing, 1925 to 1929.
30. Relative increase in value of products made in leading industrial city of each State, 1925 to 1929.

NOTE.—Best showing in each test receives 1.

Rarely is it possible to present summarized data for the same relative period of time from three such authentic sources as a United States census, a well-organized and old statistical department of a State tax commission and a comprehensive study of a great university such as has been presented in the foregoing pages on the question of taxation and its relation to industry. It has been a pleasure to compile, publish, and forward this information.

Of course, Wisconsin has its tax problem, as do other States, not so much in the form of the tax load, or its system of taxation, as in the total tax load, or high cost of government. Therefore, the Wisconsin State Chamber of Commerce, upon its organization in 1929, began a study of taxation and laid the foundation for a tax-reduction program which it initiated in 1931, seeking a reduction rather than a shifting in the tax load. The results of this movement, very generally participated in by others, to date, are reflected in tables IV, V, and VI. We have figures similar to those in table VI for all years since 1911. These are from the records of the Wisconsin Tax Commission. For comparative purposes we shall be glad to exchange the Wisconsin figures for similar figures from other States.

WISCONSIN STATE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL, 1936

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8021) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8021, with Mr. BULWINKLE in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] such time as he may desire.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I think this is the first occasion on which I have read my remarks, but in attempting to answer the speech made yesterday by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], minority leader, it seems necessary, by reason of the fact that he used certain figures and tables, I, therefore, feel that it is impossible to talk extemporaneously. However, I would like to have the stenographer take notes, as I may digress from my manuscript at times.

Mr. Chairman, on yesterday the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], the Republican leader of the House, read for 45 minutes a carefully prepared speech intended to attack some of the policies and performances of the administration. The speech was, in fact, a conglomeration of speeches made in the campaign of last fall. How effective they were at that time is now a matter of history. That, when they are carefully analyzed, they will have no greater effect in the future, I am confident. [Applause.]

Some might call the speech of yesterday the "opening gun of the campaign of 1936." It did come from the highest authority. The minority leader of the House ranks highest as the spokesman of his party. I personally would not call it the "opening gun." To me it was merely the puff of a cap pistol. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from New York started off by intimating that the policies of the new deal were "socialistic." That has always been the cry, that has always been the "bogey man" with which the Old Guard of the "rugged individualists", big business, made rich by a high protective tariff, and chambers of commerce have always attempted to frighten the man in the street and the man behind the plow. During the past 60 years, whenever the Democratic Party or any other group has suggested some measure of progress to benefit the many, rather than the few, we have heard that wail "socialistic." Of course, it is "socialistic" to the Republicans to prevent our people from starving through no fault of their own. Of course, it is "socialistic" to the Republicans to see that every man willing to work gets a job. Of course, it is "socialistic" to the Old Guard to see to it that the farmer gets a square deal and is not crushed for the benefit of the manufacturer.

The Republican Party for years has been a party concerned only with industrial centers of the North and East and with no sympathy for the South or the West, the farmer or the worker. That is political history. [Applause.]

Of course it is "socialistic" to the "only party fit to rule" to stop the robbery by bankers of the hard-earned savings of our people. That attitude of the Grand Old Party is not new. It is engraved upon its shield. It is the first covenant of its principles.

Sometime ago the gentleman from New York attacked the Agriculture Adjustment Act with as little effect as yesterday he attacked N. R. A., P. W. A., and C. W. A. In passing, he claimed this administration failed to balance the Budget. The gentleman adapts his own theory to suit his own argument. He knows, as the country knows, that for the current expense of Government the Budget has been balanced, despite any statement of his to the contrary. I am likewise sure that he has not forgotten that during the last few years of Mr. Hoover's administration his party rolled up the deficit in current expenses of about $2,000,000,000 a year. Of course, it is true that extraordinary disbursements to assist our people to obtain work are not met each year. No one would expect them to be. They are not current expenses. Much of them are long-time disbursements, and, Mr. Chairman, most of them will be repaid to the Government.

On the theory adopted by the gentleman yesterday, a like criticism would lie against the administrations of Mr. Wilson and Mr. Harding for not balancing the entire Budget during the period of the World War and its aftermath. There are many thinking people in this country who believe the present war against depression, which this administration inherited from the gentleman's party, is more important, more severe, and more devastating to our people and our country's morale than the World War. What would the gentleman do? Would he wait until the revenue comes in, before he would take care of the millions of starving, unemployed people, when the credit of the Government is good, and it can borrow money, which in the last analysis is its own money? No individual, no business, would pursue that course. If an individual or a business had credit, he or it would borrow rather than starve; but you cannot teach this old dog of the "Grand Old Party" any new tricks. The old bromides of "rugged individualism", "pay as you go", and so forth, long ago became obsessions to such leaders of the "Grand Old Party." I do not know where they picked up the word "grand", but I do know the word "old" is appropriate. The Republican Party has not had a new idea in 60 years. [Applause and laughter on Democratic side.]

Now, let us see what the Republican leader, speaking for his party, has to say about the National Industrial Recovery Act, commonly called "N. R. A." He says it "failed completely and miserably." Of course, he and every Republican leader hoped and prayed since it became a law on August 1, 1933, that it would fail, and I challenge him today to name one leading member of his party who has raised one finger to help it succeed, for the benefit of our millions of wage earners. Name one such who ever offered a helpful or constructive suggestion! Like that hermit of Palo Alto, they all have been sulking in their tents, hoping for the worst to happen at the expense of their own Government, that they might serve their own selfish ends by returning to power. That is the undeniable fact, and our people will never forget it.

Let us analyze some of the figures in the gentleman's speech. He admits a remarkable recovery occurred following the inauguration of President Roosevelt in March 1933 and until August 1933. Employment increased. Wages increased and the farmer was benefited. He makes no comparison between that period and those distressful days under Mr. Hoover from October 1929 until March 1933, but he fixes on this point—August 1933—as the criterion upon which he bases his complaint from then on.

But again he makes no comparison between the conditions that have existed since August 1933, and those dark days of 1929 to 1933, when distress and starvation stalked our land, when 13,000,000 people were unemployed, and when, at the end, every bank in the Nation was closed.

However, although in the opinion of those who have analyzed his speech all his comparisons are unfair, let us see how correct are his figures and conclusions as to the N. R. A. His speech is first based on an obvious and glaring defect. He takes August 1, 1933, as his basic date for comparison. He points to the improvement between March and August 1933, as something brought about by "natural forces", which were arrested by N. R. A. This is not only nonsense, but it is deliberately disingenuous and meant to be. Everybody knows that during the spring of 1933 there was an active, speculative boom as a result of attempts to anticipate and discount N. R. A., A. A. A., and our expected monetary policy.

His employment figures show an equal disingenuousness in other respects. He cites Mr. Richberg's report of September 7, 1934, in which, as he alleges, Mr. Richberg stated that 4,000,000 had been employed in private enterprise and 4,000,000 in public works.

He remarks that that should have left only 2,000,000 unemployed, uncared for. As a matter of fact, the relief rolls at that time did show approximately 2,000,000 potential wage earners on relief. The 4,000,000 which he alleges Mr. Richberg claimed for Public Works were in fact those employed by the temporary C. W. A. program, as Mr. Richberg's report clearly states.

The Republican leader does a great deal of juggling with so-called "unemployment figures." He overlooks two vital facts. First, the number of available employables increases by about 400,000 a year as a result of normal growth in population. Second, unemployment figures when taken as of a particular date—and this is how the Republican leader used them—are very misleading, because of seasonal influences. For example, unemployment figures taken during an off-season in such industries as automobiles or textiles would show as unemployed hundreds of thousands of individuals who actually had many months of work during the year.

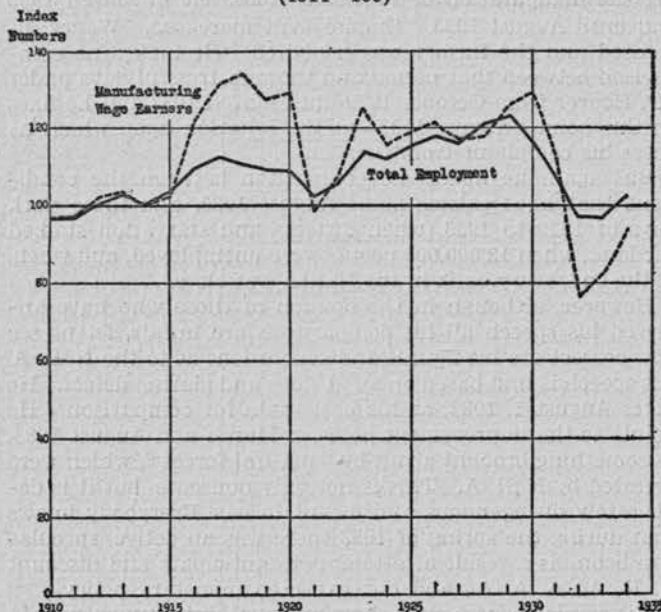

He charges N. R. A. has been a program of price fixing and production control. As a matter of fact, out of 712 codes and supplements only 6 have minimum-price provisions in effect. Some 58 more have effective prohibitions against selling below cost.

In regard to control of production the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] declares that the N. R. A. has prohibited the installation of new plants and equipment. In point of fact, out of 712 codes and supplements only 10 really have such a provision in effect, but of those 10, 1 is petroleum, a natural resource, and 2 are codes for busses and trucks which are public utilities.

He said that Mr. Clay Williams, former Chairman of the National Industrial Recovery Board said that "if the National Industrial Recovery Act was to be effective it would undoubtedly drive out of existence the small business."

Mr. Williams made no such statement. He did point out to the Senate Finance Committee that the enforcement of decent minimum wages and maximum hours would tend to drive out sweatshops and fly-by-night operators, many of which just happen to be small.

EXHIBIT A

EMPLOYMENT IN THE UNITED STATES, 1910-34
(1914=100)

Source: Manufacturing Wage Earners, Bureau of Labor Statistics, and Recent Economic Changes; total employment computed from Census Bureau data and other sources.

Now, as to employment: Let us take the general improvement from March 1933 to and including March 1935.

In March 1933, from the figures of the Department of Commerce, there were 34,822,000 people employed. In March 1935 there were 38,276,000 people employed, an increase of 3,454,000, or 9.9 percent.

Let us take the increase in total manufacturing employment. In March 1933 there were 4,924,000 employed, being the total wage earners engaged in all manufacturing industries; and in March 1935 there were 6,906,000 people employed, an increase of 1,982,000, or over 40 percent during that period.

Let us go again to manufacturing. The emergency in employment centered in manufacturing. This is shown by the chart herewith, which is marked "Exhibit A."

From the foregoing chart it appears that the index of total employment, in the depths of the depression, was only 2.9 percent below the 1914 level, whereas manufacturing employment was 23½ percent below the 1914 level. As compared with 1929 the total employment index fell 26 points, while the index of manufacturing employment fell over 48 points. The tremendous improvement shown in manufacturing employment, of over 40 percent increase, is therefore particularly significant.

Let us take employment in 60 major industries, between March 1933 and January 1935. In the following table the increases in employment are shown for some 60 major industries.

The foregoing figures, when challenged, were confirmed by the chief economist of the Bureau of Labor Statistics in testimony before the Senate Finance Committee. In the course of his testimony the chief economist pointed out that Mr. Richberg's figures had been adjusted to the census, and were therefore superior to a number of other statistical reports not so adjusted.

Let us now take up some unemployment statistics about which the gentleman from New York had so much to say yesterday.

Comparisons of unemployment statistics with employment statistics are generally confusing.

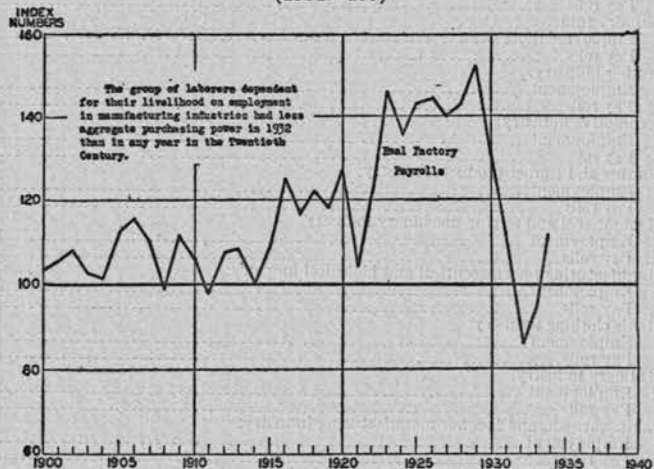

In considering unemployment statistics, account must be taken of the fact that as a result of the normal population growth the number of available employables increases by about 400,000 a year. Thus the number of employables increased by some 800,000 from March 1933 to January 1935. Furthermore, seasonal influences make unemployment figures very misleading. The real test of success of N. R. A. is the number of men actually put back to work and not unemployment guesses derived by juggling with population statistics and seasonal highs and lows in employment.

As I recall, the gentleman from New York stated that while there was some increase in wages, he said it was more than absorbed in the increased cost of living. False conclusions frequently have been drawn from comparisons between trends in pay rolls and trends in the wholesale-price index. The real test of improvement in the lot of the workingman is to be found in comparing trends in pay rolls with trends in the cost of living. On the basis of such a comparison the improvement in real wages since March 1933 is striking. Between March 1933 and March 1935 total real monthly pay rolls—after adjustments to increases in cost of living—rose $91,180,000, a gain of over 50 percent. In the same period monthly real factory pay rolls increased by $68,800,000, a gain of over 62 percent. Here, again, you will note that the emergency centered in manufacturing. In the depths of the depression real factory pay rolls had dropped almost 15 percent lower than at any time since 1900.

In other words, the group of laborers dependent for their livelihood on employment in manufacturing industries had less aggregate purchasing power in 1932 than at any other time in the twentieth century. This is brought out vividly in the chart printed as exhibit B.

Let us take up the increase in pay rolls for some 60 major industries. The above exhibit is likewise significant in connection with pay rolls in some 60 major industries. In the following chart, exhibit C, there is shown a dramatic record of improvement in hourly and weekly pay rolls.

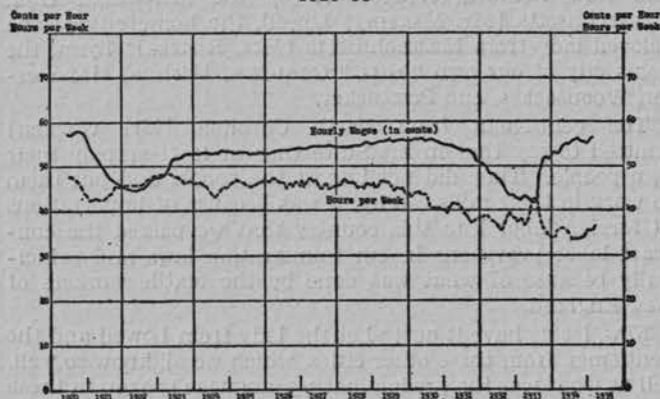

From the beginning of the depression down to March 1933 hourly wages and the length of the average working week had both declined steadily; there was a progressive shortening in the average working week. That was due to the declining rate of operations. Since N. R. A. the length of the working week had continued to decline despite the rapid increase in production, but hourly wages have steadily risen.

As a result the average weekly wage in manufacturing industries has remained about the same although the length of the average work week has been markedly reduced. Furthermore, this average weekly wage is paid to some 1,982,000 more manufacturing employees.

The gentleman from New York talked about "business activity." Let us take the New York Analyst index of business activity. According to it, business activity fell from a high of 110 in 1929 to a low of 52 in 1932. In March 1933 it was 58. In March 1935 the index had risen to 86.1.

Much was said about price adjustments. Responsible and informed opinion recognizes that the really significant facts about prices are the relationships between different prices, and, of course, the relationship between price and pay roll. The improvement in real wages I have already discussed.

The following chart, exhibit D, shows how the balance has been restored among the different prices.

EXHIBIT D

WHOLESALE PRICES
INDEXES OF BUREAU OF LABOR STATISTICS, 1926=100
(Monthly Basis)

In February 1933 the index of wholesale prices for all commodities was at a low of 59.8 (1926=100). In the same month, farm prices had reached a low of 40.9. The price index of industrial commodities, which are the commodities subject to N. R. A. (described in chart as "Other commodities"), had dropped to 66. (The low in industrial prices was reached in April—65.3.)

In February 1935 the index for all commodities had increased to 79.5, farm products to 79.1, and industrial products to 77.4. In other words, the price of farm products rose more than twice as much as industrial products, thus bringing the two groups of commodities back into balance. It is particularly important to note that industrial prices leveled off in the fall of 1933 (when the codes began to take effect) and have remained level since then. As a result, industrial prices which were well above the average in February 1933 were below the average in February 1935. In other words, in relation to the price of all commodities, industrial goods in February 1935 were cheaper than at any time since February 1933.

SMALL ENTERPRISES

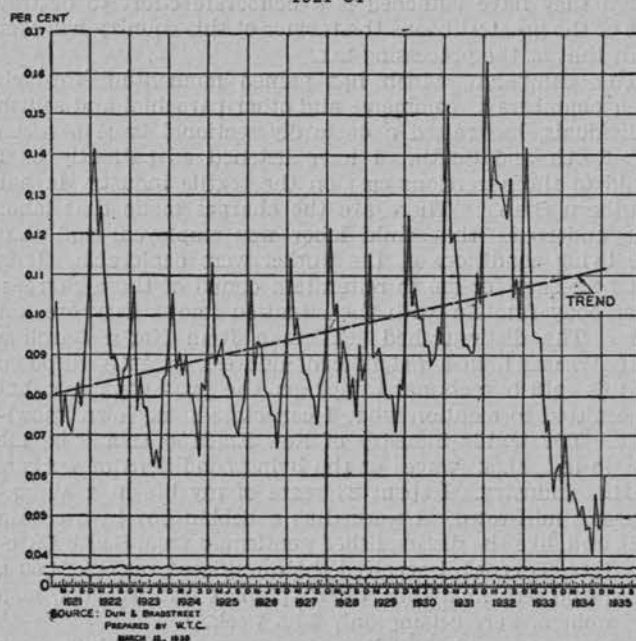

The record of N. R. A. in regard to small enterprises is clear except to those who prefer loud noise and confusion to facts.

First. The 40 years since the beginning of the antitrust laws have witnessed the most intensive increase in concentration of wealth that the Nation has ever seen. In the year 1909 there was 1 manufacturer to every 332 persons in the country. In 1929 there was 1 manufacturer to every 914 persons. Thus concentration of control had trebled during this interval. This was caused in large measure by the practices of destructive price cutting, unfair discrimination, and loss leaders which the N. R. A. has been effective in preventing. During the depression this trend was intensified. In 1929, 200 large corporations owned 49.2 percent of all corporate wealth. Two years later, in 1931, 200 corporations owned 55 percent of all corporate wealth.

Second. Now consider the trends since N. R. A. This is best brought out by the record of insolvencies. The chart marked "Exhibit E", based on Dun & Bradstreet reports, shows that the trend in insolvencies was steadily upward from 1920 to 1933. That is, the percentage of commercial failures to the total number of concerns in business increased steadily, on the average, during that period. The movement was highly irregular—each boom period was marked by a low in the insolvency rate and each slack period marked by a peak in the insolvency rate. From 1933 on, however, the basic trend is reversed. The rate of insolvencies had declined steadily since then. At the end of 1934 the rate of insolvencies was actually markedly lower than the rate during the 1929 boom.

EXHIBIT E

PERCENT OF COMMERCIAL FAILURES TO TOTAL CONCERNS IN BUSINESS, 1921-34

Dun & Bradstreet figures likewise show that the decline in insolvencies has been to the benefit of all classes of enterprises, but that the decline has been somewhat more marked for small enterprises than for large. (See exhibit E.)

These figures constitute a sufficient answer to Congressman SNELL's charge that—

This major policy of the new deal has operated to the economic death of hundreds of small business and industrial concerns, bankrupted their owners, and driven their employees onto the streets.

However, to complete the picture, I desire to supplement these figures by expressions from small business men. On April 13, W. A. Hollingsworth appeared before the Senate Finance Committee as the unchallenged representative of some 750,000 small retailers who handled tobacco products. In sworn testimony he stated:

The code of the retail tobacco trade was conceived by the little man, initiated by the little man, operated for the little man, and is administered and managed by the little man.

He added:

The N. R. A. is rehabilitating thousands of small merchants—and if its protecting arms are lifted and the lean and hungry wolves of ruthless price cutting are turned loose upon them again, what slaughter will take place.

On the same day, John A. Good appeared as the representative of 58,000 retail druggists. In sworn testimony he stated:

If the N. R. A. is going to be done away with and let big business have it, we had better look forward to a formula somewhere in the tax plan so that the taxes can be paid by them, because the little business man cannot go out and earn any profits.

He likewise stated:

I think if you repealed the N. R. A. and took away all of the protection, you would see an orgy of cutthroat competition that will put lots of the small drug stores out of business.

So much for the N. R. A.

The gentleman from New York in his complaint about conditions under the N. R. A. referred principally to the textile industry. Of course, he was referring to that part of the industry in the East and chiefly in New England. We have heard much of that complaint recently from representatives of that section; for instance, the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] and the gentleman from the same State [Mr. MARTIN]. That particular industry in that section has obviously launched a deliberate campaign to accomplish two results; first, a high protective tariff, of which they were always the chief beneficiaries under Republican administrations; and, second, and more important, this campaign they have launched is a deliberate effort to destroy one of the greatest boons the farmer of this country has ever had; that is, the processing tax.

This campaign, which has gained momentum through their chambers of commerce and other parochial and selfish individuals, has raised a dastardly sectional issue between the North and South. I have listened as patiently as I could to the aspersions cast on the textile industry in our Southern States. There are the charges made that labor was underpaid, that child labor was employed, and that the living conditions of the worker were deplorable. It is not necessary for me to reiterate a denial of those charges. Everybody familiar with the situation knows they are not true. The distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN], in a magnificent address, recently disposed of this selfish sectional attack on the processing tax, but he omitted to mention what I can state of my own knowledge. The textile industry of New England should be the last to talk about wages or the living conditions of workers in that industry. I spent 23 years of my life in a Massachusetts mill town. I worked as a bobbin boy in a cotton mill, and, like the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TAYLOR], I received the munificent sum of $1.50 a week, and this at a time when spinners and weavers, men and women, were getting only $6 a week.

I have seen company houses, row on row. I have seen company stores; I have handled the company pay tokens. I have seen whole rows of workers living in those company houses thrown in the street with all of their belongings because of some labor dispute. It does not lie in the mouths of the mill operators of New England or the steel operators of Pennsylvania or the mine operators of Pennsylvania, the chief beneficiaries of a high protective tariff, supported for 50 years by a high protective tariff, to make such charges about conditions in the South. Nor could such a complaint come with good grace from the gentleman from New York, who spoke yesterday. It is not over 20 years ago that, under Democratic leadership in the Legislature of New York, the canners were forced to abolish in that country the same conditions that are now charged to the South and which do not exist. In your canneries in upstate New York you were employing children and you were employing women in child-birth for 20 hours a day and paying them starvation wages.

It was due to the leadership of a great Democrat that this condition was abolished not so long ago. This great Democrat was Alfred E. Smith. [Applause.]

I often think of those mill towns in Massachusetts and New England, which I knew so well—Taunton, Fall River, and New Bedford, represented by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN]; Lowell, the home city of the beloved lady from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS]; Lynn, the home city of our own "BILL" CONNERY; Nashua, Manchester, Woonsocket, and Pawtucket.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] omitted to say that in his State they at least employ their own people. They did not import the people and put them to work in their mills. Why, it was because of importations of foreign labor into this country that we passed the contract-labor provisions in our immigration laws and principally because of what was done by the textile workers of New England.

Now, let us have it out! Let the lady from Lowell and the gentlemen from these other cities, which we all know so well, tell us what was the predominating language spoken in these cities 25 years ago. It was not English. Those people were fine, decent, religious, law-abiding, ambitious people, a credit to their communities, many of them rising to high place and becoming mayors and governors of some of those States, but their forefathers had been brought into New England by the textile magnates because of the low wages they could offer them and the long hours they could work them. So enough of that sectional talk!

[Since making the foregoing remarks, it has been brought to my attention that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] has spoken from the floor and charged me with "insulting" the people of New England. That gentleman was not present in the House during any part of my speech. He heard none of my remarks, nor saw the copy. So he was completely misinformed. What I said is identically as appears above and has not been changed by me in any particular.]

Now let us examine the gentleman's charges as to P. W. A. His assault upon the Public Works Administration demonstrates that he is not familiar with the facts.

His groundless charge that P. W. A. has not been administered honestly and efficiently is as absurd as it is ridiculous. Partisanship aside, there is not a man on either side of the aisle who believes that the expenditures on public works have been—what does the gentleman from New York call it?—"a malign influence against the revival of industrial activity."

Does not the distinguished gentleman know that more than 2,000,000 persons have had jobs on P. W. A. construction sites, that more than 17,000 projects have been completed or are under construction and that more than 110,000,000 man-weeks of employment have been provided? Does this record sound like "a malign influence against the revival of industrial activity?"

The simple fact is that the public-works program not only checked the precipitous plunge of construction activities in the United States during the past 4 years, but reversed that trend. These are not figures furnished by P. W. A. I quote from a recent issue of Engineering News Record, a recognized technical publication. The Engineering News Record said:

Estimates place the total of all construction in 1934 at $3,104,000,000, a 27-percent increase over the previous year's volume. * * * Public works alone are responsible for this gain.

Federal construction in 1934, including both contract and force account operations, was the greatest in the peace-time history of the country, exceeded only by the tremendous war volume of 1918 * * * .

State and municipal construction is estimated at $1,800,000,000, a 52-percent gain over 1933. P. W. A. financing was responsible for most of this, though revival of the municipal bond market reached unexpected proportions and led to construction issues at some $385,000,000 * * * .

Commenting on the 1935 outlook, the Engineering News Record said:

* * * All indications point to a maintained rate of increase. Public Works will provide the greatest share, though there are encouraging signs of a slow revival of private construction.

Does this sound as though P. W. A. has been a "malign influence against the revival of industrial activity"?

P. W. A. continued to provide the greater part of building construction employment in the country for the first quarter of 1935. The F. W. Dodge Corporation, nationally recognized reporting agency, reported that publicly financed construction contracts awarded in 1934 in 37 States east of the Rocky Mountains showed an increase of 43 percent over 1933.

Is there any "malign influence against industrial activity" here?

Certainly not, and the gentleman from New York knows it.

He goes on to say that "P. W. A. in reality has constituted the greatest existing obstacle to industrial recovery." He says that it has invaded practically every field of private enterprise as competitor to legitimate and honestly conducted industry and business.

Stuff and nonsense! In all my years in this House I do not believe I have ever heard such a wild and ridiculous statement.

Now, ordinarily the gentleman from New York is careful in what he says. Usually he checks his facts. I do not believe that he would deliberately mislead this House. And yet he comes in here and solemnly declares that P. W. A. has been an obstacle to recovery.

The absurdity of such a statement is apparent to all of you. Everybody, including the gentleman from New York, must know that business and industry generally have shared with labor and benefited from the expenditure of P. W. A. funds.

The country is dotted with P. W. A. projects. Many thousands of contracts have been awarded. Steel has been bought. Lumber has been bought. Cement, iron, brick, lead, copper, wire, paint—virtually every construction material that is produced in this country has been and is being used in this gigantic construction program. Mines, quarries, mills, and factories have been kept going by orders for P. W. A. projects. And yet the distinguished minority leader says P. W. A. has been an obstacle to recovery.

In his final desperate thrust, the gentleman from New York says that P. W. A. has been influenced by political motives, that it has allocated funds from a political standpoint.

If the gentleman knows what he is talking about, why was it that $5,000,000, not including C. C. C. or road money, was allotted for projects in the gentleman's own Thirty-first Congressional District of New York?

Does the gentleman subscribe to his own theory that these allocations to relieve unemployment in his own district smell of the pork barrel?

Does the gentleman say that the more than a score of projects in Essex, Clinton, Franklin, and St. Lawrence Counties are a "malign influence blocking recovery"?

Is it the desire of the gentleman from New York that P. W. A. and the new Works Relief Administration get out of his district and keep out?

Did the gentleman "play politics" with the President or with Secretary Ickes when his district received more than $5,000,000 in loans and grants from the public-works fund?

Some of the projects in the gentleman's district already have been completed, but if he does not like the "smell of the pork barrel" in his own district why does he not say so?

I do not believe that it is the policy of the Public Works Administration to force projects on a community against its will.

P. W. A. from the beginning adopted a very wise public policy in making public by announcement every allotment made.

Now the gentleman professes here that he has no use for P. W. A. and its "malign influence." Let us see how the gentleman's district has fared.

Federal projects

Lake Placid, post office.....	$78,650
Plattsburg, barracks.....	11,068
Malone, post office.....	138,172
Canton, post office.....	69,750
Canton, weather station.....	1,097
Massena, post office.....	60,500
Ogdensburg, dredging harbor.....	183,700

Mind you, there are four post offices in this list. But this is not all. Here are the non-Federal allotments that have been made for the ungrateful minority leader:

Ausable Forks, schools, loan and grant.....	$234,000
Pottersville, school, loan and grant.....	130,000
Keene, school, loan and grant.....	180,000
Lake Placid, school, loan and grant.....	300,000
Schroon, school, loan and grant.....	289,800
Plattsburg, water mains, grant.....	6,000
Rouses Point, streets, loan and grant.....	32,000
Plattsburg, waterworks, grant.....	42,000
Malone, sewage-disposal plant, grant.....	10,000
Saranac Lake, waterworks, loan and grant.....	16,000
Tupper Lake, high school, loan and grant.....	300,000
Canton, sanitary sewer, loan and grant.....	50,000
Ogdensburg, bridge, loan and grant.....	2,800,000

The truth is, and everybody knows it, P. W. A. has been and is free of politics. Political considerations have never dictated the allotments, swayed the decisions, or influenced appointments in P. W. A. And for the minority leader at this late date to arouse himself to an irresponsible political frenzy that causes him to make such a wild charge is almost beyond belief. I assure the gentleman that were it not for the important place that he occupies in this House I would not have answered him. As for P. W. A., the people know the facts, and the gentleman's political sound-off does not fool anybody.

So much for the P. W. A.

The gentleman had something to say about C. W. A., and, as I gathered from his speech, he made two points: First, he said there were 5,000,000 more on the relief rolls today than in July 1933. He deliberately picked July 1933, just as he picked August 1, 1933, to talk about N. R. A.; but if he had taken the comparable date, if he had taken the real date of March 1933, when we took office, compared with March 1935, then the truth, the undeniable truth, would be found to be that not one single, solitary person more was on the relief rolls in this March than in March 1933.

He said something about "graft" in the C. W. A. That charge has been all exploded. There was a grand total of 750 charges in the entire conduct of C. W. A. When they were boiled down, there were 240 charges founded, of which 163 did not involve any criminal conduct. Seventy-seven cases involving possible criminal violation were turned over to the United States attorneys for possible criminal prosecution. Seventeen of these resulted in conviction. A hundred and twelve of the 751 cases referred to are still under investigation or are pending in court.

When it was considered that the sum of $939,000,000 was spent throughout the country under the C. W. A. program, and that there were more than 70,000 persons engaged in administering the millions of transactions in spending those funds, the number of complaints and charges are surprisingly small. That disposes of those rumors as to C. W. A.

Mr. Chairman, it would take too much of my time and too much of the time of this Committee to refer to the miscellaneous charges bulked together in the speech made yesterday by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL]. Nothing this administration has ever done could possibly be acceptable to him or his colleagues. Anything progressive or in the interest of any considerable group of our people is so contrary to the principles of the Grand Old Party that they are "deplorable." He took a certain pride in some bureaus or organizations now functioning which were initiated in the last Republican administration. I think he referred to the R. F. C. and the home-loan bank. But in talking about the R. F. C. under Mr. Hoover, which loaned money only to banks and insurance companies and railroads and mortgage companies, he was not talking about the R. F. C. of ours today, which is lending money to small business men, which is rehabilitating small business and industries.

That is quite different from the R. F. C. of Mr. Hoover, which was chiefly concerned in making loans to the Messrs. Dawes and the Pennsylvania Railroad. [Applause.]

The Federal land bank: Does the gentleman point with pride to that, and does he want to compare it with our Home Owners' Loan Corporation, which has already saved 850,000 homes to the home owners of our Nation?

Mr. Chairman, it is the same "Grand Old Party" of "Rugged individualism!" It has been many years since we have been treated to one of those delightful talks by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER] about "bread lines" and "soup kitchens" during the Democratic administrations.

We have missed those delightful speeches. We used to enjoy them very much, and we have been awaiting another talk like that, so we might make a comparison between the bread lines and soup kitchens of 1893 and 1929-33. Rugged individualism! Look at those long lines and you will see to what state "rugged individualism" brought our people. That selfish policy founded on the theory of every man for himself is responsible for the millions of ragged individuals we today have to take care of. [Applause.]

The Republican theory that every man must by his own effort alone work out his own salvation has resulted in millions without any salvation, but down to the depths of starvation. It has been our duty to meet this distressful situation which we inherited after 4 years of neglect. We believe we have done our best. What we have accomplished, history will record. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] has used 50 minutes.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DARROW].

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Chairman, it is my desire to bring to the attention of the House, if I may, and particularly to the attention of my good friend the distinguished Chairman of the Rules Committee [Mr. O'CONNOR], a concrete illustration of the serious effect that the N. R. A. and the new-deal policies are having upon some of our industries in their efforts to compete with foreign competition.

Mr. Chairman, American industry is being seriously threatened by foreign competition, not only by foreign trade agreements and what under present conditions are ridiculously low tariff rates, but in addition the increased costs of production imposed on our manufacturers by strict compliance in operating under the provisions and regulations governing the National Recovery Act.

If there has been any feature of the N. R. A. which has had practically universal approval, it has been what is generally designated as "fair-trade practice", which, if enforced, is the strongest defense against what is commonly known as "chiseling." So far as industry is concerned, this without doubt was one of the main purposes of the N. R. A. It would, therefore, seem it should be the purpose of the National Recovery Administration to give prompt attention to complaints filed by our industries in the manner required, so that no unnecessary delay may be entailed and that prompt relief might be accorded when their complaints have been established.

In this connection I wish to present, as an example, the situation in which one of our industries in Philadelphia, manufacturers of optical goods and goggles, faces by reason of increasing importation of goggles from Japan while they are awaiting action on a complaint filed with the Imports Division of the National Recovery Administration.

I am informed that since the National Recovery Act has been in force over 35 American industries have filed complaints with the Imports Division of the National Recovery Administration, under paragraph 3 (e) of the act, against the sudden increase of imports from abroad, chiefly from Japan. Among these is the sun-goggles industry, whose complaint was filed in September 1933, and after an investigation by the Imports Division of the National Recovery Administration the President directed a public hearing to be held in this case by the United States Tariff Commission. At this hearing, which was held on July 18, 1934, it developed that in 1932 sun goggles were imported from Japan totaling 349 dozen; and in 1933 this increased to a total of 97,888 dozen. Subsequent data reveal that importations of sun goggles from Japan again increased in 1934 to 224,098 dozen.

From a total of less than 1 percent of domestic production prior to the National Recovery Act, importations of sun goggles from Japan have now surpassed 24 percent of the total American production of this commodity, whereas in some months, notably October 1934, the importations from Japan were in excess of the entire production of all American factories combined for that month.

These importations of sun goggles from Japan are being sold at prices which are considerably lower than the costs for similar styles of the American manufacturers working under their N. R. A. code, and either the importations must be radically curtailed or additional heavy unemployment will ensue in this industry. At the present time domestic manufacturers should be at the peak of their production for the current goggle season. Instead, they are compelled to reduce the hours of labor and to dismiss workmen from their jobs. It is manifestly unfair to expect the American manufacturer to continue to pay code wages when the market is being flooded by Japanese merchandise produced with child labor earning several cents per day, and adult labor paid at the rate of a few cents per hour.

American styles and display cards are expertly copied by the Japanese at prices which spell ruin to the American manufacturer. I have here a sample goggle marketed by our Philadelphia firm on a display card, and another goggle marketed by the Japanese mounted on a similar card. At a quick glance it would appear both goggles are identical. So far as style and appearance of the goggles are concerned they would, without close examination, appear to be the same. However, the most manifest unfair practice is the fact that the display cards are identical in form, in printed type, in placement of printed matter and color—the Japanese have made an exact copy of this American manufacturer's card, with one minor exception—the name of the article—and even this is printed in the same style. The card also contains a cut of a woman wearing the goggle, which is an exact reproduction from the American card, even to its sharpest lines.

That is what I claim is manifestly intended to deceive the American public by making them think they are buying American-made articles. The only difference is, in very small type at the very bottom of the card, where the statement appears "Made in Japan."

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DARROW. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. In connection with the exhibit which the gentleman is showing of the imitation, is it not a correct statement to say that the glasses and the entire outfit were manufactured first in this country and there was sufficient time elapsed to allow a copy to reach Japan?

Mr. DARROW. They were manufactured, and these cards were made in this country and then taken to Japan and copied exactly.

Mr. TREADWAY. I thought it might be well to have the RECORD show that at this point.

Mr. DARROW. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion.

This unfair Japanese competition is, of course, at prices which spell ruin to the American manufacturer; and although it has been 20 months since the complaint was filed by this industry, no relief has been granted to correct the demoralizing effects of these skyrocketing importations and the undermining of the domestic price structure.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DARROW. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman state what is the difference in prices?

Mr. DARROW. I will give that in just a moment.

A curtailment of the imports from Japan of this commodity to the monthly average in effect prior to the introduction of the N. R. A. code seems to offer one solution to this problem; and if this is promptly consummated, the result will be a restoration of confidence and reemployment in this industry, as well as added employment to an ever-widening circle of suppliers of raw material to these manufacturers.

This, of course, is only one of the many American industries which are threatened by Japanese competition in particular. If the life of these industries is to be spared, action must be taken promptly by the administration in Washington, on whose mercy they are wholly dependent. They have a right to expect the Government's cooperation and protection, especially since they have fully met the requirements of the Government in their operation under the N. R. A.

Now, as to the cost of these goods, there are quite a good many different styles, of course, and it would take considerable time to go into the detail of that, but in the exhibits that have been shown here, the Japanese selling price in this country is $9 per gross. The American cost of manufacturing that same grade is $9.36 per gross. Comparison of other grades of sun goggles which are in competition with each other are where the Japanese selling price is $8.40 per gross the American cost is $8.86 per gross; $10.20 per gross against $17.80 per gross; $10.20 per gross against $17.20 per gross; and $18 per gross against $28.75 per gross.

The Japanese selling prices include import duties and transportation charges and are those charged the syndicate stores through whom the bulk of these imports are sold. The American costs include labor, material, and factory overhead, and do not include selling or advertising expenses or salesmen's commissions. They are the actual cost of production at the factory.

Mr. REED of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DARROW. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. I listened rather attentively to the gentleman's statement. Did the gentleman describe the difference in wages between this country and Japan?

Mr. DARROW. Only in a general way.

Mr. REED of New York. Would the gentleman object if I gave him the comparative wages, just briefly?

Mr. DARROW. I would be very glad to have the gentleman put that in the RECORD at this place.

Mr. REED of New York. Industrial wages in Japan, according to figures collected in December 1934, were as follows:

Rayon operatives receive 17 cents a day, and women cotton spinners 20 cents. In hosiery mills men get 37 cents and women 18 cents; lathe turners get 58 cents a day; molders and foundries, 57 cents; carpenters, 51 cents; stonemasons, 60 cents; bricklayers, 61 cents; and day laborers, 31 cents. The Japanese male spinner gets 3½ cents an hour for a 10-hour day, and a woman spinner gets about 2 cents an hour.

Mr. DARROW. I thank the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DARROW] has expired.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, before beginning the remarks I wish to make at this time, I want to refer to the last explanation that I have heard of the reason for the textile depression. It is perfectly astonishing to hear a gentleman of the intelligence of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] rise on this floor and say that the textile depression in New England is the result of the employment of cheap labor in that region and lack of interest in behalf of American citizens—that people up there do not speak our language.

I would like to have the gentleman from New York look over the statutes of the State of Massachusetts and other

New England States and compare them with any statutes regarding the health and well-being of employees in mills and textile institutions.

We in New England have pioneered in health laws. We have pioneered in hours of labor. Our health and labor laws cover women in employment, night work in mills, and every detail having to do with health, sanitary conditions, and inspection of factories.

As for the type of men and women employed in these establishments, I say they are typical of the right type of American citizens. So I resent the intimation that the citizens employed in the textile establishments in Massachusetts and New England are not of our very best type of citizens; and I resent the insinuation that the manner in which they are cared for under our laws is not the very best type of care. To give that as an explanation for the textile depression is the limit of Democratic demagoguery; and, as I said, I resent it.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Does not my colleague agree with me when I say that we of New England are not apologizing for the people who came to New England 40 or 50 years ago?

Mr. TREADWAY. We are not apologizing for them or for those who came either before or since.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. They are good, honest, thrifty people and have helped build up our country.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman is absolutely correct. For my good friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] to make a statement such as he did, that the depression was due to the type of citizen, forsooth, that we were encouraging to be employed in our factories and our mills, is the last word in logic from a leading Democrat, for he knows one of the major factors in the depression is the flood of cheap foreign importations, not the goods made here or the people employed in their manufacture.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to revert to the few remarks I wish to make at this time. I do not expect to say a new thing. I am going to make a few quotations and a few comparisons. I want to call the attention of the Members to promises and to compare those promises with performances. So it will be necessary for me to make some very definite quotations, but they will be authoritative and of a type that I think will bear the careful inspection of the Members of the House.

My first quotation is from the Democratic platform of 1932. I quote:

We believe that a party platform is a covenant with the people to be faithfully kept by the party when entrusted with power, and that the people are entitled to know in plain words the terms of the contract to which they are asked to subscribe.

That was part of the platform which the then candidate, the nominee of that convention, flew to Chicago to accept. Governor Roosevelt in his speech of acceptance on July 2, having kept the convention in session several days, I believe, in order to make the speech, said:

The platform which you have adopted is clear. I accept it 100 percent.

There is no effort, therefore, to squirm from this clear covenant with the people in the platform.

In looking over the platform, however, we do not find any suggestion in it that Congress would be called upon to surrender virtually all its powers to the Executive. Immediately the Democratic Party came into power we were asked to delegate the congressional power to the President of the United States to do with as he saw fit. Why, if this was a clear-cut covenant with the people on which he was running for President, did not that platform call attention to the fact and give the people some chance to say whether or not they favored that sort of delegation of congressional authority to him? There was no clear statement along this line. Nor do we find that the policies of this country were to be dictated by a professorial "brain trust" not responsible to the people.

It would have been the part of clear out-and-out frankness with the people to have told them that when elected to office he expected to throw out everybody who had had any experience in the departments and install second-grade college professors and establish a "brain trust" such as is running the country today. We do not find any reference to that in the platform. Nor do we find any reference to the fact that business was not going to be given a fair show.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield, although I know the gentleman will make some caustic remark.

Mr. McFARLANE. I would like for the gentleman to give us an idea of who he thinks should have administered the Government, the Wall Streeters? Their rule of 50 years has wrecked the country.

Mr. TREADWAY. I shall be very glad to answer the gentleman. In the first place, I would not have started with Wall Street. I would have started with a much more experienced type of man to fill the position than the men who have been selected.

Mr. McFARLANE. The overwhelming majority of the people in the United States do not agree with the gentleman's line of thought.

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes, yes; that is true; I admit that an overwhelming majority of the people did vote for Mr. Roosevelt for President; but you did not give them a frank statement of what you were going to do or what you wanted to do in case you were elected. I will also state that "the overwhelming majority" to which the gentleman refers was obtained by promises and not performances. It has dwindled tremendously.

Mr. PIERCE. What happened in 1934? Did the people endorse him then?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. PIERCE. Did they accept him?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes. The Democrats have been very extravagant with the people's money in order to get that endorsement. [Applause.] That is the reason they received the endorsement, and that is what you are going to try to do next year, now that you have $4,880,000,000 to spend freely and as you see fit. Anybody can put their hand into the dough bag and get the money. That is what you are going to try to do next year. We know the game perfectly well. There is not any question about what you did then and there is no question but what you are going to do it again, but if the people are wise they are not going to fall for it.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McFARLANE. What would the gentleman have us do? Let us have the gentleman's program.

Mr. TREADWAY. I will give the gentleman the program. Do not get too excited or too anxious and do not get ahead of my talk. The gentleman is really anticipating what I am coming to.

Mr. McFARLANE. Is that so?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. McFARLANE. I was hoping the gentleman would get there before nightfall.

Mr. TREADWAY. I will get there before my time is up if I am not interrupted too much.

Mr. HOEPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HOEPEL. Does the gentleman know that we are giving the people a new deal because in my district, for instance, I have a Republican postmaster who has resigned and who is clamoring to be relieved, yet Mr. Farley keeps in office the Republican postmaster when there are several Democrats to take the job.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is the difficulty. There are so many willing Democrats that Mr. Farley will make enemies if he picks any one of them. I know lots of instances of that kind. I know of dozens of post offices occupied by Republican postmasters because the Democrats do not dare to make a selection of one Democrat when there are dozens of them that want the job.

Mr. EKWALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. EKWALL. Is it not true they do not want to relieve the Republican undoubtedly on account of his efficiency?

Mr. TREADWAY. Well, the Democrats are not looking so much for efficiency, as far as I can observe. They do not expect to have any efficiency in office. Of course, if the gentleman is correct, it is an exception to the regular Democratic rule.

Mr. Chairman, the people were entitled to know just what was in the Democratic platform in plain words. Where was there any information that every business in this country was going to be put under strait-jacket regulations supervised by departmental clerks in the city of Washington? Who ever thought or dreamed, when they were voting the Democratic ticket in 1932, that every industry in the country today would be asked to submit to a code system?

Why, objections to the code and the effort to get some practical suggestions properly made up filled the Washington hotels for months, and I believe are still doing so. This was in an effort to get a practical way in which business could be carried on. I do not see any reference of that kind in the Democratic platform, which was the promise of the Democratic Party to the people, and on which they were elected in 1932.

What suggestion is there in that platform that the rights of States should be usurped and that Washington would undertake to control the legislation of States and dictate to the States what they must do in order to get the benefits of this grab bag of public money? I do not see any reference of that kind in the Democratic platform that that is what they intended to do.

We do not see any reference to the fact that this administration intended such tremendous economic and social reforms, both words misnomers, because there is no economy about them. That is as certain as gospel. There is no economy in these reforms, nor are the social reforms of any consequence whatever. We find no reference whatsoever to them in the Democratic platform.

In other words, the platform is one of omission of what they were actually going to do, rather than actual promises to the people as to what they would do.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ARNOLD. The gentleman is complaining about the condition in reference to codes. Is the gentleman now speaking for the 90 percent of the business men in various activities who have voluntarily worked out these codes, or for the 10 percent of chiselers who have made business ethics impossible throughout this country?

Mr. TREADWAY. I may say to the gentleman from Illinois that the question, to my mind, is so ridiculous I am surprised the gentleman would ask it.

Mr. ARNOLD. Well, let us have the answer.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think it is ridiculous from this viewpoint: The gentleman from Illinois intimates that 90 percent of the business people have voluntarily submitted themselves to the code system. Notice the word "voluntarily." Find me a business man who voluntarily came to Washington to help write a code governing his method of doing business. He just does not exist. Of course, it is not voluntary. It is forced on them by your administration.

The gentleman mentions 90 percent. I will accept the gentleman's figure. I do not know as to the number actually operating under the code today, but I have a great many of them in my district, and wherever there is a small industry employing a few people, say in a local community, you will not find one of those but what will say that every code that is written is an oppression of the worst character against carrying on their business.

Mr. ARNOLD. Is the gentleman speaking now with particular reference to the local automobile dealers throughout the country?

Mr. TREADWAY. No; I am not.

Mr. ARNOLD. I thought not.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am not referring to automobile dealers. I am referring to my own experience in corresponding with my own constituents, who certainly are very much upset at the code regulations. Further, may I say that today you are aware that the Government is being besieged to change the codes and make them practical so that the business people may live and exist under them. There is no question about that fact.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to my colleague from Massachusetts.

Mr. HEALEY. At the outset of the gentleman's remarks he referred to the splendid social and labor regulatory laws that are in effect in the gentleman's State.

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; and in your State; our mutual State.

Mr. HEALEY. I believe the gentleman will admit that for some 20 years now there has been a migration of the textile industry from the gentleman's State, and from my State, to States having less stringent regulatory laws?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. HEALEY. Because the capital invested in the textile mills was in search of a cheaper labor market. Now, will not the gentleman admit that the Democratic administration accomplished something when it set up a code of regulation establishing a minimum wage in the textile industry and also eliminating child labor in that industry?

Mr. TREADWAY. I agree with the gentleman and I may say further that efforts to secure those very results have been made for years and years by Republicans as well as Democrats. The gentleman is aware of that, of course. We have tried to get a constitutional amendment that would accomplish this very purpose in respect to doing away with child labor everywhere and equalizing the wage scale in the various sections of our country. No doubt we are in hearty accord upon these subjects and I agree with the gentleman and do not hesitate to admit the facts about child labor and a minimum-wage scale. I am not saying that the minimum-wage scale is correct as it is now adjusted, but the child-labor proposition, under the code system, is most excellent. If there are good things I shall not hesitate to praise them just as much as I shall criticize the bad things.

Mr. WOODRUFF and Mr. HEALEY rose.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am afraid I shall have to arrange with the gentleman in control of the time to get further time, because I have hardly gotten started upon what I expected to say and half of my time is already gone.

I yield now to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman's colleague from Massachusetts has called attention to the fact that as time has gone on the textile manufacturers in Massachusetts have found it increasingly difficult to compete with the textile manufacturers of other sections of the country, and I take it he means the South.

Mr. TREADWAY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman is certainly familiar with the minimum wage scales under the code. He must be aware of the fact that the textile manufacturer of the South has a lower minimum wage scale than the textile manufacturer in Massachusetts?

Mr. TREADWAY. There is a differential there and let me further call the gentleman's attention to the fact, which he so well knows, that while the minimum may be protective, I am not finding fault with domestic competition; my fault is to be found with foreign competition, very largely.

Mr. WOODRUFF. That is my principal objection, I will say to my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. Of course, I know the gentleman's views, but I will say that there evidently is not a sufficient differential in certain sections of the country between the minimum wage and the maximum wage to take care of the additional cost in northern textile mills.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; this is the last is it not?

Mr. HEALEY. Yes; this is the last. The gentleman, I think, will admit that the minimum wage established by the N. R. A. code in the southern section of the country represented an increase of 100 percent, so therefore the minimum wage paid in the textile industry in that section before the N. R. A. codes were adopted was about $6.50 per week, and this was raised by the N. R. A. code to $13 a week as the minimum wage; I think the gentleman is willing to admit that this was a long step in the right direction and constitutes a definite accomplishment of this administration.

Mr. TREADWAY. That the Republican administration started. You cannot put any reform through overnight, and do not take credit to yourselves that you did it, either.

Mr. WOODRUFF. What I was about to say was this. We will agree with the gentleman's colleague from Massachusetts that it was a step in the right direction, but it was a mincing step, it was a hesitating step, and inasmuch as they were trying to correct this situation, why did they not take a full vigorous step and establish the minimum wage of the South in exactly the same amount as they established it in the North?

Mr. TREADWAY. That is a question the gentleman would have to ask them to answer, not me.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. ARNOLD. At the rate the gentleman's party was going toward the abolishment of child labor, how soon does the gentleman think they would have accomplished that purpose, and is it not much better that the purpose was accomplished when it was?

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, in answer to the first question of my colleague from Massachusetts, I admitted there were good features in the code system, including these features you are speaking of, but you have mixed so many rotten things with it that your average is mighty low.

Mr. ARNOLD. May I ask this further question? If it had not been for the codes establishing a minimum wage in the textile industry, would not your industries of New England been drawn to the South under the old-wage schedules?

Mr. TREADWAY. Gracious me, it could not have gone down any worse than it has been doing with your codes. Our mills never were running on as short time as they are today. So, do not take too much credit for your code or we may come back on you with respect to your minimum wage.

Mr. ARNOLD. The fact that wages in the South have been doubled has relieved you to that extent.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to my colleague from New York.

Mr. REED of New York. There has been a lot of noise made about the restriction of child labor under the code. As a matter of fact, there are child-labor laws on the statute books of every State of the Union, and they were there before the code was put into operation, with the exception of two States, Georgia and Mississippi.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman is correct and I think I practically touched on that very matter in the opening of my remarks in criticizing the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. McFARLANE and Mr. LORD rose.

Mr. TREADWAY. I have done pretty well by the gentleman from Texas, and I think perhaps I should let some of my other colleagues have a chance, and I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LORD. Mr. Chairman, I was interested in the discussion of child labor. The Congress submitted to the people some years ago for the States to vote upon a child-labor amendment to the Constitution and yet in this House, as well as in the Senate, we are employing boys of some 12 years of age. I wonder why we are not under the N. R. A. here.

Mr. TREADWAY. The patronage here is preferable to the N. R. A. system. Now let me proceed to call attention to platform promises against performance. It is understood I am quoting each time from the Democratic platform.

We advocate an immediate and drastic reduction of governmental expenditures.

That is a clear-cut statement in the platform in plain English. They say the people are entitled to know. What are the performances? The Democratic Party has increased the actual expenditures in the fiscal year of 1933 from $5,000,000,000 to $7,000,000,000 in 1934.

Budget estimate of expenditures for 1935 is $8,500,000,000, and same amount for 1936.

These figures do not include the billions of contingent liabilities that have been incurred, such as the guaranty of farm-loan bonds, two billions; guaranty of home-loan bonds, two billions; authority to H. O. L. C. to issue one and a half billions of bonds; insurance of mortgages under Housing Act, two billions; and so forth.

The gentleman from New York told us that we had been balancing the Budget. That looks very much like it when we have increased expenditures by three and one-half billion dollars. Still the platform said that they advocated immediate reduction in Government expenditures.

Here is another extract:

We advocate the elimination of extravagance.

That is a wonderfully attractive plank to go to the voters. President Roosevelt, in one of his campaign speeches, accused the last Republican administration of being the greatest spending administration in peace time in all history.

Well, it might have been in all our history up to that time but certainly it was a piker when we look at the expenditures and the extravagance of the present administration. The figures I have quoted show that the expenditures of the Democratic administration are 40 to 60 percent greater than the last Republican administration, and now this doubtful distinction of being the greatest spending administration in all history has come back and is resting on the Democratic doorstep today. [Laughter and applause].

Here is another plank:

We advocate the immediate and drastic reduction of governmental expenditures by abolishing useless commissions and offices, consolidating departments and bureaus.

Why, that was one of the clear cut words in the contract that people are entitled to know about. They advocate the abolition of useless commissions and offices, consolidating departments and bureaus.

What is the performance? The creation of fifty-odd alphabetical bureaus. There were hardly enough letters in the alphabet to combine into these various bureaus. Increases in the number of civil employees from 563,000 in February 1933 to 685,000 in March 1935. Most of these 122,000 additional employees are patronage employees, put on by the Democratic Party, and still this wonderful platform calls for the abolishment of useless commissions and the consolidating of departments and bureaus.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Would the gentleman mind telling the Committee which of these alphabetical commissions which he talks about he would abolish?

Mr. TREADWAY. It would take me a much longer time to do that than my friend would yield me.

Mr. BULWINKLE. But the gentleman stated it was wasted, and I am asking the gentleman to tell to the House which ones of them he would abolish.

Mr. TREADWAY. Practically all of them, I would say to the gentleman, and the Republican Party will see that they are abolished when we get back into power next year.

Mr. BULWINKLE. All right, the gentleman will abolish all of them.

Mr. TREADWAY. I said practically all of them. I am not saying there is not some good in some of them. You cannot have so much chaff without having a little bit of wheat. You would have to find something worth while with all of these different things that you have combined here. There must be something good somewhere.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Cannot the gentleman say which ones he would abolish and which ones he would not?

Mr. TREADWAY. I have said I would abolish practically all of them, so that there would be 122,000 less Democratic officeholders. The only really worth-while one is the R. F. C., established under President Hoover.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Has the gentleman thought sufficiently which ones he would abolish?

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not have to think. I have no chance of abolishing them for nearly 2 years. Two years from now we will answer the gentleman's question seriatim.

Mr. BULWINKLE. But I am asking the gentleman now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 more minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. Balancing the Budget is my next topic. The Democratic platform read as follows, and I am quoting from that:

We favor maintenance of the national credit by a Federal Budget annually balanced on the basis of accurate Executive estimates within revenues, raised by a system of taxation levied on the principle of ability to pay.

Then Mr. Roosevelt, in one of his campaign speeches said:

It is my pledge that rigid governmental economy shall be forced by a stern and unrelenting administration policy of living within our income.

Delightful! The performance is as follows: A deficit for the fiscal year 1934 of $3,630,000,000; an estimated deficit for 1935 of $4,297,000,000, and an estimated deficit for 1936 of $4,000,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, if $4,000,000,000 of deficit is living within a fixed income, what would be a real deficit? But that is what they promised, and the other is what they have actually performed.

I quote now from high Democratic authority, a speech made in the Senate on March 19, in reference to the $4,880,000,000 works bill. Senator GLASS, a former Secretary of the Treasury, said:

I still maintain the view that the appropriation contained in the joint resolution would bring us too near the point of impairment of the public credit. I have said already that an impairment of the credit of the United States to the point of 10 percent would so impair the credit of the banks as to render 90 percent of them practically insolvent.

There is the viewpoint of a former Secretary of the Treasury as to what this deficit is doing to the general credit of the country. Let us see what the currency plank of the Democratic platform is:

We advocate a sound currency to be preserved at all hazards.

And still one of the President's first official acts was to take the country off the gold standard. Later he repudiated the gold clause in United States bonds and currency. He repudiated the just debt of the United States Government as well as private individuals and corporations, in not living up to the terms under which those bonds were written. It is no wonder that people are scared. Later he reduced the gold content of the dollar to 59 cents and he has the power to reduce it still further.

Last night I was quite amused at the defense of that change of values by the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Morgenthau. For a mess of nonsense and useless statement I recommend that address over the radio made by the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury. I hope some of our Democratic colleagues will see to it that it is put into the RECORD, because it is a choice bit of literature.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I regret that I have been interrupted so much that I cannot yield more.

Mr. RANKIN. I merely wanted to ask unanimous consent to insert the speech in the RECORD.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think it would be fine to do that. I am sure that the Republican side would greatly appreciate having that very amazing address in the RECORD.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting the speech of the Secretary of the Treasury made last night over the radio.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is a request that must be made in the House and not in the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. TREADWAY. I want to quote the Democratic platform on unemployment and old-age insurance:

We advocate unemployment and old-age insurance under State laws.

Bear that in mind. That is the only reference to unemployment and old-age insurance in the Democratic platform. The social-security bill sets up a strictly Federal system of compulsory old-age annuities, and imposes pay-roll taxes on employers and employees to pay the costs, a new kind of taxation on a tax-burdened country, probably unconstitutional, and evidently it is admitted so by the Democratic administration because they do not bring the bill up in the Senate.

The unemployment-insurance provisions of the bill not only coerce the States into enacting unemployment-compensation laws, but at the same time impose Federal standards. So the performance on that issue is absolutely contrary to the terms of the Democratic platform.

Here is another extract from the platform:

We favor effective control of crop surpluses, so that our farmers may have the full benefit of the domestic market.

Was that not fine and splendid? What did they do? Here is the performance: Farm crops have been destroyed to such an extent that we are now importing many agricultural products. Tariffs have been reduced on a number of farm products and other reductions are contemplated under pending reciprocal trade agreements, the purpose and effect of which is to give foreign producers a larger share of domestic markets. But the promise made in the platform was to control surplus stocks so as to keep the domestic market for the agricultural products of this country.

Taxes: In the first campaign speech on July 30, 1932, Mr. Roosevelt said:

Our party sees clearly that not only must Government income meet prospective expenditures but this income must be obtained on the principle of ability to pay. This is a declaration in favor of graduated inheritance and profits taxes and against taxes on food and clothing, whose burden is actually shifted to the consumer.

Here is the performance: The Democratic Party has imposed burdensome processing taxes on the necessities of life, falling most heavily on those least able to pay. That could be elaborated on in a speech as long as the time of the House would be in session today. It is a self-evident truth that the kind of taxes that have been levied have been against the people least able to pay, and on the very necessities of life, food, and clothing.

Now, the platform advocates stronger and impartial enforcement of the antitrust laws to prevent monopoly and unfair trade practices and the revision thereof for the better protection of labor and the small producer and distributor.

The actual performance is suspension of the antitrust laws under the N. R. A., the creation of monopolies, and the oppression of all kinds of small business. Compare the promises in the platform with the performances after securing office.

Now, here is an interesting plank:

We condemn the improper and excessive use of money in political activities.

I want to repeat that. That is extremely interesting to me—

We condemn the improper and excessive use of money in political activities.

No doubt that was very enticing to many voters when they read that Democratic platform and realized that it was a covenant with the people that they condemn the use of money in political activities. What is the performance? The Federal Treasury has become the campaign chest with which to entrench the Democratic Party in power at least as long as the money lasts. The taxpayers' money is put into the chest and passed out under Democratic auspices, in spite of the fact that in their party platform they condemn the excessive use of money in politics.

Mr. HOEPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. No. I am sorry I cannot. I only have a short time remaining.

Mr. HOEPEL. I would like to give the gentleman some information.

Mr. TREADWAY. We have plenty without any additional from the gentleman. This will answer one inquiry that was made of me a few moments ago, and I want to be sure to get it in, realizing that there are others entitled to the floor. This answers the inquiry of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. McFARLANE]. Now they want to know what I think we ought to do, and I think the Republicans would do most of it if given the power. Of course, we are continually asked. Criticism was made of the brilliant speech made by the minority leader yesterday that he offered no constructive program. That is no criticism. It is praise.

Why should we offer a constructive program when we have but 1 vote out of every 4 in this House? If the people will see to it that a good, active minority comes into Congress, no matter which party is in power, then there will be constructive work by the minority. Today we are handicapped, and people are getting mighty sorry that we are, too. Every mail brings letters, editorials, and comments on how they wish there could be a change made.

Let me give you one little illustration: I received a letter a day or two ago from a distinguished constituent who had made an offer for quite a large contract for interlining for coats used to make us look square-shouldered.

The price was very satisfactory to the customer, but the customer wrote back that on account of the chance to get the price of interlining reduced coming from foreign countries under the reciprocal-tariff arrangements, he could not accept the offer. What better illustration do you want than that? Do you think the hands in that mill would be very happy to know that they lost that order on account of this great effort to have a reciprocal tariff in order to bring imports from foreign countries to compete with our own home labor?

My idea of a constructive program would be to live up to most of the items in the Democratic platform I have just read: (a) Reduction of governmental expenditures; (b) elimination of extravagance; (c) maintenance of the Nation's credit by balancing the Budget—both of them; (d) stabilize the dollar and insist on a sound currency; (e) enforce the antitrust laws; and (f) eliminate Government competition with private business.

If the Democratic Party, now two and a half years in power, had carried out some of those promises to the American people made in the platform adopted in Chicago in 1932 there would not have been this howl that is going up all over the country today against the Democratic administration.

Now, let me offer a few additional proposals: (a) Repeal the reciprocal tariff law. That is the first constructive suggestion I would offer if the Republican Party were in power; (b) repeal the processing taxes; (c) abolish tax-exempt securities; (d) concentrate on recovery and leave a lot of this foolish reform legislation for the future. Let us recover before we reform; (e)—and there is no bigger offer to the constructive program of the future than this (e) on my program—leave business alone; let business, private enterprise, have a chance to breathe and live and have life injected into our various communities; (f) restore to the three branches of the Government the authority vested in them by the Constitution.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. In just a moment. For the life of me, I cannot see how any self-respecting, 100-percent, trained industrial business man can agree with the gentleman from Illinois when he says that business voluntarily has accepted these regulations coming to them from the "brain trusters" in Washington. That is not the kind of business people we have in Massachusetts; I do not think he has them out in Illinois either. Our people are trained business people and they want to attend to their business, to make an honest living, and to furnish employment for American citizens. That is what we want in this country today, less "brain trusters" and more private business.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. My time has expired.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I will get the gentleman 2 additional minutes if he wants them.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, my distinguished friend and colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] in his speech today referred to me and to the district which I represent, and I think that unconsciously he misquoted me. He intimated that I had said in a speech the other day that in the South now at the present time there are conditions of child labor and low wages. I did not say that in my speech the other day. I said that a few years ago they had child labor in the South, long hours of labor and very bad wage conditions.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Gladly.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I wish to say to the gentleman, representing as I do a southern State, that there has been no child labor in North Carolina for many years, and that the cotton-mill men of my county proposed a compulsory school law in order that the children of North Carolina might go to school instead of to work.

Mr. CONNERY. I am glad to hear my friend from North Carolina say that. There have been southern States, as he knows, of course, in which they did have child labor and extremely low wages; and organized labor had a very difficult time attempting to organize those southern States in the interests of shorter hours and decent wages.

The gentleman from New York spoke about the N. R. A. I think the gentleman made a very effective comparison of conditions since the inception of N. R. A. with conditions before that time. Before we had the N. R. A. the mill situation in New England and wage conditions in particular were very bad. While we had no child labor, we did have low wages and the speed-up and the stretch-out system in our mills, the same as they have now in the South; and today, although wages are a little better in the North, we have the speed-up and the stretch-out systems in both the North and the South. N. R. A. put the textile industry upon a 40-hour week, and that gave us in New England a break which we had never had in years, because previously the southern mills had longer hours, sometimes up to 60 and 70 hours a week, as against our 48-hour law in Massachusetts.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. COLDEN. What does the gentleman mean by the speed-up and the stretch-out systems?

Mr. CONNERY. The stretch-out system works this way: Where a man formerly was supposed to tend one to three looms in a mill they suddenly put him in charge of six looms, which in many cases is ruinous to health.

The speed-up system is the system whereby the general operations of the plant move at a faster pace, the machines are speeded up. That is practiced not only in the textile industry but generally in the automobile industry and in almost all other industries. It was brought out in testimony before our committee that although wages in certain industries were raised from $4.50 up to $5 a day, which is one of the highest wages paid in industry, they speeded up the machines the men were using so that they did almost twice as much work as formerly. Then the manufacturers spread the word over the country that they had granted their employees great increases in wages, but were very silent as to the speed-up system they had installed.

I am for N. R. A. I am for it because it did away with child labor. It did away with so-called "yellow-dog contracts" whereby a man would have to promise in writing that in consideration of getting his job he would not strike during the time he was employed in the factory and that for a year after his employment in the factory ceased he would not come near the factory if there was a strike to picket or attempt to hinder that factory in any way. The contract also contained a promise that he would do practically everything he was told to do by his boss without regard for any of his rights as a citizen. In other words, it was slavery. The N. R. A. did away with child labor and the yellow-dog contract. Then it put the power of the United States Government behind labor in its right to organize, recognizing that labor had the right to organize.

Then in section 7 (a) of the N. R. A. the right of labor to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing was endorsed. Those four things alone in the N. R. A. would justify its existence and have been the greatest boon to labor that we ever had in perhaps 150 years of the existence of the United States. There are other phases of N. R. A. with which I entirely disagree, but those four points to which I have referred are epoch making.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. In referring to section 7 (a), of course, the gentleman does not believe that section 7 (a) is being enforced now?

Mr. CONNERY. No.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Nor has it been given the meaning which the Congress gave it when enacting it into law?

Mr. CONNERY. No. Over in the Senate there was offered an amendment which would permit company unions, when the N. R. A. matter was up for action over there. Senator WAGNER, of New York, and Senator WHEELER, of Montana, made speeches against the amendment, and in their speeches they made it very clear that the Senate intended section 7 (a) should outlaw company unions. That amendment was defeated. Then the bill became law. An Executive order was issued making it very plain what section 7 (a) stood for. The next day a statement was given out to the newspapers in direct contradiction to the Executive order. This statement was given out by Mr. Richberg, and that statement is responsible for all the unrest that we have in labor today and for the strikes. I know that, because we have had all of this testimony before our committee.

And while we are on that subject, may I pause at this point to say that the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] is a very valuable member of the Committee on Labor. May I also say that the Wagner labor-relations bill and its companion, the Connery bill, which we reported a few days ago, put teeth in section 7 (a). In other words, that is what the whole bill is about. It puts teeth into section 7 (a) and gives the National Labor Relations Board the power really to enforce section 7 (a). That is what the Wagner-Connery bill calls for.

Mr. KENNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. KENNEY. Have the hearings on the Wagner-Connery bill been printed yet?

Mr. CONNERY. The hearings will go to the Printer tomorrow. They are being prepared now. I may say also that the Secretary of Labor came before our committee, and Mr. Francis Biddle, Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, and testified in favor of the Wagner-Connelly bill.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to my good friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman earlier in his speech referred to some other parts of the speech. Will the gentleman advise what part of the speech he has reference to?

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] mentioned the foreign element having been brought into the United States and into New England to work in our mills. I thought he spoke in a rather disparaging manner in that regard and as if immigrants to the United States, who came to this great land of the free and the home of the brave, had no right to go to New England and had no right to work in the textile industry. I want to say that in the city of Lawrence we have 43 nationalities represented. Those people and their sons and daughters are some of the finest American citizens that you can find any place in the United States of America. [Applause.] I do not think the gentleman from New York had any right to refer to those people in the disparaging tone he used.

Mr. Chairman, this is not a partisan matter, and it is not a North and South matter, as the gentleman from New York tried to make out. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] and Members from the other Southern States know what is going to happen to their textile industry down there. They will close unless a very serious situation is remedied. It is not a question of the mill owners. If the mills do not run, the workers do not work. If the workers do not work, their wives and children do not eat or they have to go on welfare; and I am just as much interested in the workers and the wives and children of the workers in North Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, or Mississippi, or Tennessee as I am in the workers in Massachusetts. It may be said that this is just talking to please my colleagues from the South, but I think anyone who has been before the Committee on Labor will bear me out in the statement that I and every member of that committee are interested in all of the people of the United States and not in the people of any particular section of the country.

I agree with some of the things which the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] said about the textile industry.

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. CONNERY. I agree that the textile industry under the Republican tariff got protection and is now getting protection. I agree that Mr. Andrew Mellon's aluminum concern got protection under the tariff and should not have gotten it. I think there are other big interests getting tariff protection which should have no tariff protection whatsoever, do not need protection, but under the system in which we have legislated here in reference to our tariff problems there was no chance to vote on separate items. To protect your own district you had to vote for the whole bill or vote against the whole bill. So we have evils in the tariff and we have good in the tariff.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to my colleague from Massachusetts.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. May I inquire if the gentleman agrees with the thought expressed by the gentleman from New York that we are overprotected at the present time?

Mr. CONNERY. Not on textiles; no. Not on shoes; no. We had 6,000,000 pairs of shoes come into the United States before the tariff bill was passed. We have stopped that at least.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman rather implied that we were overprotected at the present time. He certainly does not agree with that.

Mr. CONNERY. I do not agree with it so far as textiles are concerned, but there are other things like the Aluminum Trust and others which should not have any protection at all. We know there are evils as well as good points in the tariff.

Mr. MICHENER. In other words, the gentleman is not overprotected on anything produced in the gentleman's district?

Mr. CONNERY. Shoes and textiles are all that we are protected on and I just stated that we had 6,000,000 pairs of shoes come in from Czechoslovakia underselling us on the American market. This was at a time when 3,000 shoe workers in Lynn were walking the streets. So we were not overprotected there. As to textiles, you can see what the mills in my district are up against at the present time with Japanese imports taking away their market.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I should like to ask the gentleman, who is Chairman of the Labor Committee, if he feels that we are over-protected on any commodity which has heretofore been primarily produced in this country and which is now absorbing the United States market by being shipped into this country from other parts of the world? Are any of those commodities over-protected?

Mr. CONNERY. I think some of them are. But may I say, under our laws we exclude Asiatics, not because of their color but because of their cheap-labor conditions, and then we allow them to send into our country the products of their cheap labor, unlimited hours of work, and almost incredibly low wages, to compete with and undersell our own products in our own markets, and actually encourage them to trade with us under the plea that we must protect our export trade. American workers should not lose their bread and butter to stimulate imaginary foreign trade. If the gentleman will get a copy of my bill (H. R. 6993) which is now pending before the Ways and Means Committee, the gentleman will find this bill provides that wherever the total landed costs of any commodity or article coming into the United States are less than the cost of the production of a similar article or commodity produced in the United States, that article shall be barred from the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAWFORD. That will answer my question provided—

Mr. CONNERY. That covers your Japanese situation, your farm situation, and everything else.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That answers my question provided you include in the cost of production a reasonable, living standard for the man who works in this country, whether on the farm or in the factory.

Mr. CONNERY. That is understood, of course. We are trying to protect the wages of the workers of the United States as well as the interest of the farmers. They are bringing in wheat from the Argentine and from Brazil now. Other foreign farm products are being brought in and therefore the idea of protecting the farmer is going out the window. I look forward in the very near future to see the farm Representatives of this House stand up here and ask for the passage of a bill like the Connery bill which will protect the farmers and the workers of this country against foreign importations.

Now, in regard to textiles, the Democratic Members of New England in the House here after a conference with Secretary Hull and Secretary Roper asked the President to appoint a Cabinet committee to look into this question and discuss this matter of the importations of Japan, the A. A. A., and the textile situation in general, to find a solution for the problem. The President appointed a Cabinet committee consisting of Secretary Hull, Secretary Roper, Secretary Perkins, and Secretary Wallace. They have been holding hearings on the matter, and it is not a question of the North or the South. Representatives from the southern mills and representatives of southern workers have been before this committee, as well as representatives of northern mills and workers, and when the committee makes its report to the President I am hopeful we will get an adjustment of this matter which will be fair and equitable to North, South, East, and West. But I resented today the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] in reference to the "foreigners", as he called them, who have come to New England.

Also, the gentleman from New York did not mention the fact that when he worked in a mill at the wages he spoke of—$1.50 a week, I think he said—and then my friend from South Carolina [Mr. TAYLOR] the other day said he got 5 cents a day when he worked in a mill in South Carolina—the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] did not mention the fact that the people of Massachusetts long ago revolted against these conditions and put a 48-hour law on the books and provided minimum wages in Massachusetts, and in your N. R. A. you have a follow-up of this theory in order to protect all the workers of the country.

Now, I hope this Cabinet board, which has been appointed by the President, in its report will take care of this matter. Otherwise, we are going to lose eventually the great majority of our textile factories in the entire country.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Massachusetts 2 additional minutes.

Mr. CONNERY. We are going to lose a great industry in the United States, and lose it to whom? If we lost our factories in New England to Alabama or any other Southern State, at least some Americans would be getting work; but when we are going to lose these textile mills to Japan, Germany, or England, and have our American workers walk the streets because of this sort of policy, then I say it is time for us to wake up and take care of America.

Now, I may go too far in the minds of some of you when I say that I am for America first, last, and always, and let the rest of the world take care of itself. [Applause.] I am in favor of buying American goods. I am in favor of an adjustment which will mean decent wages for the industrial workers of America. I am in favor of a decent price for farm products, but until the farmers and the workers in Congress and outside of Congress get together and through their organizations throughout the country work out their problems in harmony you will have the farmer getting nothing for his products and you will have the worker ground down to an impossible, nonliving wage. [Applause.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, a little while ago my good friend from New York, who was born in my district and whose folks are splendid constituents of mine, made reference to my activities in behalf of the textile industry. I think when his speech was delivered it was the voice of the gentleman from New York, but it was the reflection of sentiments of some of the administration officials rather than his own.

The gentleman is living in the past when he talks about labor conditions of a good many years ago. We are concerned with present conditions. That is the trouble with some of the Democratic leaders at the present time. They are living too much in the past; they do not understand the sentiment of the American people at the present time. The people today do not care what happened 4 or 5 years ago. They are chiefly interested in what the Democratic Party is doing at the present time to put the people back to work. That is the real issue, and no smoke screen can conceal the issue.

The American people do not intend to countenance any system which means that for all time they must live on a dole. They demand work at real wages, a living wage, and a saving wage. We who come from New England, who are fighting to save our industries and keep men at work, are performing a real service. Mention has been made of some of the early immigrants of my section.

I am glad of the honor to defend the splendid people who make up my congressional district in Massachusetts. They came from every part of the world; they came from England, they came from Ireland, they came from Canada, from Portugal and Italy—all came to the country with the determination to live honestly and contribute to the upbuilding of the country of their adoption.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Did not the expert weavers of the world come from Manchester, England?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Yes; and they became valuable members of this Nation and contributed to the development of the industry in New England.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think that all this propaganda about foreigners is bunk, that they are responsible for many crimes and labor disturbances, and that if we shall provide unemployment insurance and old-age pensions a lot of this disturbance would not exist?

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman from Massachusetts did not hear what I said.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Oh, yes; I did.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am not talking about the gentleman from Massachusetts who is speaking; I am talking about the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY]. He came on the floor and someone told him something that I said. What I said was that these people that were imported from Canada to work in our mills were the finest, most decent, religious, ambitious, law-abiding citizens we ever had.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. When did the gentleman say that?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I will not change a word in my speech. I said that these mills in New England imported labor to the detriment—

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. In what way?

Mr. O'CONNOR. They imported them; and they were prosecuted for violation of the contract-labor laws.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I believe there is a studied effort on the part of officials of this administration to discredit New England. Certainly they plainly tell us where we stand. I am going to recite three different instances, all presenting evidence which tells us in the language of the boy on the street where we are probably going to "get off." The other day a distinguished member of the President's Cabinet, Mr. Wallace, went up to Maine and delivered an address that will always be remembered by everyone who lives in New England. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] shortly afterward rose here with a carefully prepared address, and he continued along the same line as Mr. Wallace. I am told, and I say this from hearsay, though I think on fairly good authority, that the President of the United States thought so well of Mr. WARREN's speech, mainly an attack on New England, that he sent a letter which conveyed his congratulations. Now comes the gentleman from New York. He rises here and delivers an address which unquestionably was prepared, and it is along the same line.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Yes. I do not want to do anybody an injustice.

Mr. O'CONNOR. There was nothing in my speech that was not prepared between last night and this morning after I got a copy of the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], except for some figures furnished to me by some of the departments. Every word in the speech was my own, except those figures.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. It is unfortunate that the gentleman's remarks seem to be of the same tenor of the others, and also, if I recall, he went out of his way to praise the speech of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. No; I will not.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Not now. Why should not New England come here and express what is for her own welfare? Why should not we from New England protest against the processing tax which is a 50-percent tax on one industry? We know the industry cannot live weighted down with this unfair tax, and we would fail in our obligations to our own constituents if we did not rise and fight to give them a chance to live.

Mr. ARNOLD rose.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman will pardon me, but I cannot yield. In the other speeches made this afternoon no one yielded, and I think I have been more liberal than anyone else.

Mr. ARNOLD. I am sure the gentleman has not yielded to me.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ARNOLD. Does the gentleman believe that New England should be the chief beneficiary of the tariff and then object to giving a corresponding benefit by the processing tax to the agricultural sections of the country? Does the gentleman demand special favor for New England?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. We of New England do not ask special favors from anyone. We are willing to stand on our own feet and compete with the rest of the country. We say you should not single out any one industry, and when I talk about the textile industry I am talking about the South as well as the North. We say that you should not impose a burden on one industry it cannot stand and, generally, I believe is unconstitutional. If it ever goes to the high court, I believe you will find you cannot assess one industry for the benefit of another group. No; we do not want any advantage, but we have the right to say this great American market should be protected. We have a right to demand industries paying an American wage shall have an opportunity to live. This administration is preventing the American worker from living when it permits all these Japanese imports to pour in here. These imports take jobs away from the American people. I am for protecting the industries in New England, and I want also to protect the industries of Pennsylvania, the Carolinas, the sugar men of the West, and all others. I would give protection to all American industries wherever located. We of New England have a right to ask that any system of Government regulation of business should so regulate it that all sections of the country are on a parity. What is wrong about that? Why should not a man in New England who is competing for the home market expect an opportunity on an equal footing with competitors in the South? Is there anything wrong about that? Only yesterday a gentleman from Illinois came to see me and he told the same story of the New England business man, that he could not compete with the lower wage scales in the South.

Let me give you a few figures:

The Government study, made in August 1934, shows the average loom fixer in the North, for a full 40-hour week, earns $25.92, while in the South the average pay is $20.28. Female weavers in the North, according to the Government report, average $17.40 for a full 40-hour week, while the southern women weavers average $15.28.

Male weavers in the North average $17.68, and in the South $16.04. Picker tenders in the North average $16.28 as compared to $12.52 for the same workers in the southern mills. Slubber tenders in the North get $19.52 per week, while in the South the average wage is $14.96. Speeder tenders in the North receive $16.08 for female operators as compared with $14.12 in the South. Male speeder tenders in the northern mills average $18.16, while in the South they get $14.72.

Women spinners in the northern mills average $15.12, against $12.84 in the South. Warper tenders in the North get $15.96, while in the South the average wage is $13.32. Doffers in the North average $17.28 per week, while in the South they earn $13.96. Oilers average $14.48 in the northern mills and $12.60 in the southern plants.

Truckers, watchmen, and laborers averaged from 25 to 30 percent more in the northern mills than in the South.

In brief, it is estimated the difference in wages paid in the North amounts to $40,000,000 more annually than corresponding wages in the southern mills. This is $40,000,000 which southern manufacturers take out of the pay of their employees with which it is possible to shade prices below the price at which the northern competitor can sell. In the spirit of fair competition this situation should not be permitted to exist with the sanction of those who form the codes. This is an unfair advantage. Someone says it has been so in the past. That is true; but we have entered a new era. We have entered an era where the Government is regulating business, and when the Government regulates business it should not discriminate against any section of the country. All sections should stand on a parity.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] asked if we wanted special favors in New England. Under the tariff both the southern mills and the northern mills got the same rate of duty, did they not?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. But during that time, until we had the N. R. A., we had a 48-hour law in Massachusetts and higher wages, and we were competing with them unequally, and now all we are asking is a square deal.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. DINGELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. DINGELL. Is it not true that these advantages, so far as the South is concerned, were even greater prior to the N. R. A. than they are now?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I would not hesitate to say I believe that is true, but that is not the question. The question is that now, for the first time, the Government is regulating business. It is regulating hours; it is regulating wages. When the Government attempts to supervise industry certainly it is just and fair that we should all be on an equality. I say to you, whether you are Democrats or Republicans, whether you come from the North or the South, ultimately water reaches its level. Either the southern wage scales must go up or the northern wage scales will go down. That is inevitable. I, for one, want to see the scales of the workingman, whether he be from the North or the South, raised, because I believe that higher wages will mean increased purchasing power and greater benefits to all the American people. It contributes to a better civilization.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. Would the gentleman have us enact or write a different code for his section and a different code for the South?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. If the gentleman had listened carefully to what I said, he would not make that inquiry. I said I wanted all to be on a parity; the same code in New England, the same code requirements in Alabama.

Mr. McFARLANE. Well, are we not on a parity now?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. No. We have a code, but there are differentials in the code. That is what I am protesting against.

Mr. RABAUT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. RABAUT. The gentleman knows that the N. R. A. has brought about some good.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] has expired.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Massachusetts 2 additional minutes.

Mr. RABAUT. For instance, in the cotton-stocking industry, they were getting a salary of something like $5. On the minimum wage it brought the cost of stockings to twice their former price. Certainly that increase in money went to labor.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman does not regret that, does he?

Mr. RABAUT. No. I am for it.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Would the gentleman not go a step farther and go higher?

Mr. RABAUT. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. That is all I want the gentleman to do. Now, we in New England might well question the insidious move to create support for the A. A. A. legislation with several thousands of farmers trekking to Washington, farmers who are supposed to be in distress and need help from the Government; spending money on a trip to urge legislation that they seek. I do not believe that is fair to the American people who pay the bill. These farmers should keep the money and spend it for their own welfare and the welfare of their families at home, rather than pay railroad fare and food bills away.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. ARNOLD. I am wondering if I understood the gentleman correctly. The gentleman said it was not fair for the American farmer to come down here to look after his own interest.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. No, I did not. He has a right to come here, but I do not think anyone who is receiving relief money from the Government should spend that money to come to Washington to influence legislation. I would not approve a man on F. E. R. A. paying his carfare and the price of a Pullman ticket to come to Washington, when that money was given by the Government for him and his family to live.

Mr. ARNOLD. Does not the gentleman think that the American farmer is entitled to a corresponding tariff, through the processing tax, to that of the manufacturing industries of this country?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I want to help the American farmer. I have said, with regard to the processing tax, I did not desire to take any relief from the farmer. I am willing he should have relief. I was willing to let the President of the United States take it, through the power he has, out of the relief fund. I have said that on the floor of the House. I believe he could remedy an injustice if he did so.

Mr. ARNOLD. I understood the gentleman was opposing the processing tax and trying to have it repealed.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I am opposed to the processing tax as it now stands and with the burden falling as it does on a staggering industry.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] has again expired.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California, a member of the committee, Mr. DOCKWEILER.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I shall avoid speaking upon any controversial question. I shall confine my remarks entirely to a phase of the bill that we are considering, the subject matter of our Congressional Library.

Every Member of Congress, while he is privileged to be here by virtue of the votes of his constituency, has many other privileges that he does not perhaps fully appreciate. One of those privileges is that he has at his command at all times, the conveniences and facilities of one of the great libraries of the world.

In 1800 the first law was passed by Congress appropriating the rather modest sum of $5,000 to commence the Congressional Library. In subsequent years that appropriation was increased. The first bill entitled that library, "The Library of the Clerk of the House." Two years thereafter it was entitled "The Congressional Library." We all know that since that time, during the last 135 years, the Congressional Library has grown to be something that we Americans are quite justly proud of.

It might be well for us to know what our Congressional Library does. Oftentimes, like myself, Members neglect to read the testimony of what our agents who are conducting the business of our legislative establishment are doing, and we take an appropriation bill more or less for granted. This year we are appropriating $115,000 for the purchase of new books, new periodicals, and new manuscripts for the Congressional Library. Thirty thousand dollars of this sum, of course, is spent for continuations of periodicals that were previously subscribed for and, consequently, in the full sense of the word these are not new purchases, but the balance of this sum is taken by the Librarian and devoted, as best he can, to the purchase from time to time of private libraries that are thrown upon the market.

The one division of the Congressional Library in which I am more particularly interested than any other is the law division. It was only a few years ago that the Congress directed any attention to purchasing books for the law division. We find law books here in connection with our legislative establishment; the Supreme Court has a little law library between the Senate and the House; we have off the House Chamber a little library where law books are to be found, but the major portion of our law library is in a certain wing over in the Congressional Library. It took the appearance and the testimony of several Supreme Court justices who appeared several years ago before the committee to direct attention to this need. At that time the first appropriation was made—$50,000. The appropriation has been continued up to the present time and is continued in the pending bill.

Because of the reputation of the Congressional Library, and the fact that the American people, particularly the American school children, know its worth and view it as a great institution, people have left as gifts to the Congressional Library their very fine collections. On page 148 of the committee hearing is a snatch of testimony I should like to read. Dr. Putnam there states:

Of course, the most notable gift in recent years was the bequest of Mrs. John Boyd Thatcher, which included nearly a thousand fifteenth-century books, autographs, and some other material. The appraisal of that for purposes of inventory reached between three and four hundred thousand dollars. I suppose that is the most important single gift of material, but we are receiving numerous gifts in the course of each year.

From the past record and the history of the Congressional Library it is quite likely that as the years go on and as our civilization becomes more entrenched and our Republic becomes more intensified in its cultural activities, the Congressional Library will loom up as the great central depository of all sorts of the best manuscripts, books, and works in America.

Our Congressional Library undertakes some very odd functions that we might not think of. One of those functions is the purchase of books for the adult blind. There are two types of books used by the adult blind. Two-thirds of the books are printed in the Braille system, which we all understand to be a method of embossed printing of dots, which are read by the touch of the fingers; but there is another kind of book being collected by the Library for the use of the blind, called "talking books." These are becoming more popular than the Braille. A talking book consists essentially of a phonograph record of a substantial novel or a work of good quality. A master record is made, of which duplicates are sent throughout the United States and deposited in 22 libraries in the most populous centers, so blind people may fill their recreational moments by hearing these records of current books of good quality. The machine used by the blind person to transcribe this book record costs approximately $42 and is a combination phonograph and radio. Because of the work of the Congressional Library on this single phase of helping the blind, small charitable societies have been formed in many parts of the country through which money has been raised to purchase these machines for use in institutions for the blind. If you want to do a good work in this country, one that is unusual and not often heard of, I would suggest that in your communities you develop charitable societies along the lines indicated for the purchase of some of these transcribing machines for the use of the blind. The value of this system lies in the fact that more than one person at a time can enjoy the recitation of a good novel or a good scientific work. Many people sitting within range of the sound of the transcribing machine can enjoy the latest fine works of literature.

The Congressional Library, among its other activities, includes what is called a "legislative reference service." The legislatures of most of the States of the country meet every 2 years. At the conclusion of these sessions many laws have been passed, distinct laws in each State. The legislative reference service of the Library of Congress collects the laws passed in the 48 States of the Union and publishes them according to certain headnotes and indexes so that we Members of Congress, or the members of the public entitled thereto and interested in the subject, can write to the Congressional Library and secure or borrow that volume. Under one headnote or title is to be found every piece of legislation touching the subject that has been passed by any one of the 48 legislatures of this Republic.

Another very important service rendered by the Congressional Library is in connection with the Union Catalog. Testimony touching this subject matter appears at page 143 of the committee hearings. Several years ago John D. Rockefeller, Jr., gave the Congressional Library $50,000 per year for 5 years in order that this fine work could be commenced.

What is this Union Catalog? You may live in North Dakota and in your reading you might discover some very fine work referred to that you cannot procure in your own library. In fact, you do not know just where it does exist. You write the Congressional Library. You will be informed that the certain work may be found in the library, say, in Cincinnati, or it might be found in a library in San Francisco, or in the regular library at the University of California. This is called the "Union Catalog." It has today as many as 8,000,000 titles and has indexed 14,000,000 locations. The clearing house for this information is here in Washington at the Congressional Library. You cannot get the same information by writing to a library that is cooperating in the making of this Union Catalog. They cannot furnish you the information. They contribute their list of titles to the main office or clearing house, the Congressional Library, hence you must write the Congressional Library, and you will find where the book may be located and procured if you are interested in so doing.

This is a service primarily to the legislative establishment. The history of legislation shows that the Congressional Library is our institution primarily. It is there for the service of Congressman and Senators. Then the law part may be used by the Supreme Court, and the other establishments of the Government are entitled to use it, the public coming in fourth. Of course, there is no discrimination, because at all times a single book is not always wanted, so the public can be served as well as the legislative establishment. But it is there primarily for us to use.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McFARLANE. I have listened to the splendid address of the gentleman, and I would like to know if the gentleman has given thought to the advisability of furnishing, say, 50 or more sets of United States Code Annotated Statutes to the Library as a circulating medium, whereby we, as legislators, can find the law and have it available as and when we want it in our office? We are legislating here without having the law before us. Does not the gentleman believe this would be advisable?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I received a communication from a Member on that subject, and while it might be advisable, it would be quite expensive at this time, in view of the comparatively small amount we give our Librarian to purchase books. I may say that I think it would be a very nice thing to have, but it is expensive.

Mr. McFARLANE. We are daily passing on legislation of the most technical sort; yet we do not have available to us the law or the annotated statutes themselves as and when we want them for our convenience in looking carefully into the law as it exists and in determining what it ought to be. There would be little expense involved as these volumes are available for about $1 each. I think it would be a great help to us if we had available the annotated statutes so that we could go carefully into these matters daily, which is our duty.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Of course, the gentleman understands he may call up a clerk in the office of the Congressional Library and a page will bring the book over to him immediately.

Mr. McFARLANE. I may say to the gentleman that I have tried that, but the volumes have not been available. They have a very limited supply over there. I have had it frequently happen that someone else has the book.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HARLAN. The gentleman from Texas mentioned the annotated statutes and the letter I got concerned Rose's notes. To what does the gentleman refer?

Mr. McFARLANE. Both. I have in mind now the annotated statutes. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RAMSAY], as I understand it, has a bill pending before the Library Committee at this time covering Rose's notes as well as the statutes.

Mr. HARLAN. There is a set of those over in the library of the old House Office Building.

Mr. McFARLANE. There is only one set over there and they are not available to the different Members who may be studying at night, or at other times when the library is not open or available to us.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I am glad the gentleman from Texas brought up the particular item because it emphasizes again the fact that every Member of Congress must always remember that the Library is for his service and not for the public. It is primarily for the service of the legislative establishment and was created by law to serve the legislators in the preparation of the law of the land. If you find that somebody else is using the books who has not the primary right, then you may demand that those books be made available in your office in helping you to prepare the law of the land.

Mr. KENNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. KENNEY. We have a new archives building now and presumably there will be a research bureau there. I was wondering if the gentleman has considered whether the services of the Library of Congress will be lessened or the Archives Building will be something in addition to the service rendered by the Congressional Library?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. We had very little testimony touching that subject, particularly as to whether or not the original Constitution and Declaration of Independence should be transferred. There was a little more discussion on the subject of what would be the duty of the Archivist, but I think it will be supplemental to the Congressional Library, because primarily the Congressional Library is our agency; whereas we intend that the Archivist and his functions will be in the nature of a national public agency. I again repeat that, under the law, the Congressional Library has the right to expect to receive trust funds for the purchase of certain types of books and under that trust fund, now called the "Library of Congress trust fund", there has accumulated by trust gifts from time to time a total amount of about $700,000.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Of course, many of these gifts in trust are for special purposes, but I mention this item so that the country may know that there is this legally constituted trust fund to which they can leave their moneys if they so desire for the furthering of the cultural purpose of having some of the great manuscripts and fine books accumulated here in Washington.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I yield.

Mr. HARLAN. I would like to know if the gentleman has considered the advisability of using the fund that Justice Holmes left the United States, so that, instead of having it simply melt away in the General Treasury, we might use the fund to establish such a library over there, dedicated to Justice Holmes, as he would very greatly appreciate himself, if living, in respect of legal research or something of that kind?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I may say to the gentleman from Ohio there was incidental discussion of that matter and I have seen the form of a bill that has been prepared by one of our colleagues which will direct that this particular sum of money be devoted to a special use, say, in law library work in the law library of Congress. Either such a bill has been introduced or I have seen it in preparation. [Applause.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, it is pretty hard at this juncture to state who are the forgotten men, whether they are the unemployed, amounting to 11,500,000, or whether they are the 125,000,000 consumers, or whether they are the men and women hitherto engaged in the textile industry who have lost their jobs and have been put out on the streets to join the army of the unemployed.

If I were to suggest an answer I would say that the forgotten men are those who are unemployed through the direct action of the new-deal policies such as the textile workers and those engaged formerly in the cotton industry. I rose today to speak because the Philippine people, according to the press, have decided to adopt the commonwealth plan of autonomy for 10 years by an overwhelming vote before assuming complete independence.

It may interest some of you southerners to know that the Philippines have been our greatest single export market for cotton goods—by far our single, largest market, and that 2 years ago we did 75 percent of all the importation of cotton goods into the Philippines and that after 2 years of this new deal international socialism and international free trade and long-distance visionary methods of the State Department, Japan is doing 75 percent and we are doing less than 25 percent, a complete reversal of textile trade with the Philippines.

Now, the Philippines are not a foreign country. The Philippines are still under the control of the United States. We buy $85,000,000 worth of goods from the Philippines. We buy about 90 percent of all they produce, and we only sell them about $18,000,000 worth of goods as compared with the $85,000,000 we buy from them.

The Filipinos are intelligent. They naturally want to preserve this trade. They want the good will of the United States and of the American people, and they have considered themselves up to now as part of the United States. So the Philippine Congress offered to protect the American textile trade and cotton-goods imports into the Philippines by protective duties so that we would hold this market which we have had for many years, and what happened? Inconceivable as it may sound, they made the offer to protect our own industry, the second largest industry in the United States, employing 450,000 American wage earners, and the State Department, through the Secretary of State, turned thumbs down on the offer of the Philippine Congress to protect our own industry and our own textile export trade with the Philippines. I do not know that you can use strong enough language. It comes nearer being a treasonable act to American wage earners and to American industry than anything I have known of in the 15 years I have been in Congress, and I defy anybody to show a single act of any administration that compares with it in any way at all—but this is the situation and those are the facts.

As I came into the House this morning the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN] got up and congratulated the farmers for coming up to Washington to seek certain extensions of benefits received from the Government. I wonder if he represented the tomato farmers of Florida. I wonder if he represented the early spring vegetable producers of Florida who are up in arms at the competition with Cuba. What he referred to, very largely, I assume, is the fact that a lot of cotton farmers and cotton producers have come up to Washington in order to continue the 12-cent cotton benefits.

Now, let me tell you this. Lenin, who was the leader of the Russian Communists, and a trained observer of human frailties, said that the capitalists will commit suicide for a temporary profit, and this is exactly what the farmers are doing. The cotton farmers of the Southland are willing to commit suicide for temporary profit. As long as they can get 12-cent cotton they do not care about the future. They do not care about the loss of the cotton-export markets of the world, the real wealth of the South, and they do not care whether the South is ruined or not in the future provided the temporary benefits continue at the expense of the consumers and the taxpayers.

It is unmistakable; it spells ruin to the entire South. The reduction of 25 percent in cotton production obviously increases unemployment and adds thousands to the relief rolls in the South—those that pick cotton or are engaged in ginning, compressing, transporting, or shipping cotton.

Cotton was king. Up to now cotton has always been king in the South to such an extent that the South did not ever believe that there could be any war between the North and the South because other nations would intervene on account of their necessity for cotton. They thought they controlled the world. Today, what do you see? You see you have lost 50 percent of the world cotton markets under the new deal, under these visionary theorists, international socialists, and free-trade crystal-gazers.

What are they doing? The Southland is following these impracticable pied pipers—the Wallaces, the Tugwells, and Ezekiels—in a dance of death, to its financial and economic destruction.

Of course, you people from the South do not dare to say a word. You are afraid of the cotton farmers; you are afraid because they are making a temporary profit; you are afraid to tell them the truth, to tell them that they are facing ruin within 20 months.

The South is a good part of the United States, and when you destroy its welfare you affect the entire country.

Nothing can stop it unless you Jeffersonian Democrats get on your feet and tell some of these visionary theorists, these international socialists, that you have had enough of this new-deal dance of death. It is time that the South spoke for itself, and it ought not to be necessary for me, a northerner, to get on the floor and tell the people of the South what they are facing and what is going to happen.

Why, as you continue subsidizing 12-cent cotton we have lost 50 percent of the world cotton markets while foreign countries, such as Brazil, India, Egypt, China, and Soviet Russia, have produced 3,000,000 more bales and taken the market away from us in the past 2 years, and you are going to lose the entire world market for cotton within the next 2 years.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ARNOLD. Can the gentleman tell us how much this country has lost in foreign trade by reason of the retaliatory tariff walls which were caused by the high-tariff policy in this country?

Mr. FISH. The gentleman knows that I am not going to discuss the tariff situation with him today. I began by discussing the tariff situation in the Philippine Islands, and I told the gentleman and the rest of the Members of Congress that we lost the Philippine market because the State Department refused to permit the Filipinos to give us protection when they offered it.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I want to challenge that statement the gentleman has made.

Mr. FISH. I cannot yield any further.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield for a question? I want to correct your statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman from Texas seems to dispute my statement about the loss of Philippine textile trade. Here are the figures: In March 1932 the United States sold 5,677 packages of cotton textiles to the Philippine Islands and Japan 1,027. In March 1933 we sold 12,499 packages and Japan 1,225. In March 1934 the United States sold only 1,880 packages, whereas Japan sold 5,800, and in March of this year the United States sold in cotton textile packages to the Philippines 1,340 as against Japan's 8,000. It is more than 75 percent. It is a vanishing market, and it will vanish completely in the near future.

The entire trade will vanish within 6 months unless the Philippine Congress, which meets in July, gives us the duties they offered to give us and which were refused by the State Department. Unless they give us those duties in July we will not have any textile business left with the Philippine Islands. There is no answer to that. Those are the facts, undeniable, unpleasant, and very obstinate. I rose to present them today, because the Filipinos have adopted a new form of government. They are still ready to act in July, but they will not act, of course, if our Government puts thumbs down and turns over this trade to the Japanese labor at 20 cents a day as compared with our free labor. That is what has happened. Our labor in the textile industry has been sacrificed on the altar of free trade and the visionary long-distance policies of the Secretary of State. There is no more estimable gentleman in the world than Mr. Cordell Hull, but he is a free trader and an internationalist. His long-distance visionary free-trade policy will go into effect in 5 years, when all the textile mills, North and South, are shut down and Japanese labor has taken over our markets. That is what we are facing, and it is no wonder that the gentleman from Massachusetts and some gentlemen from North Carolina and other States are worried. That is the issue before the Congress at the present time. Are we going to permit the State Department to say to the Philippines, you cannot protect American goods. Are we going to remain silent? Is it not time for you people who represent the textile industry, to say to the Philippines, we buy practically all of your goods and we are entitled to some protection for our own second largest industry? That is what it comes down to. Yet when anybody gets on the floor of this House on the minority side and stands up for the textile industry or says anything about the cotton industry there are always those who doubt the figures. Is there anybody on the Democratic side, is there anybody representing a cotton State who does not know that we have lost 50 percent of our export trade in cotton? Is there any one who does not know why we have lost it? If there is I would like to have that gentleman answer me.

Mr. McFARLANE. I will answer the gentleman. If we have lost any export trade in cotton, it is because of the Hoover tariff policy and the Republican Party policy generally of building up a tariff wall that forced us to lose the market. That is responsible for any loss of cotton market for us, and the gentleman knows it. Any losses suffered were because of the policy which his party has pursued.

Mr. FISH. And that is what the gentleman has to say, is it? That is his complete answer? It is very far from complete. We had the cotton market of the world 2 years ago, and we have had the cotton market of the world for many years, and have always had it under Republican administrations, but we are exporting less today than at any time since the Civil War. Yet here is a man from a cotton State that gives a ridiculous answer of that kind. That is not an answer. It is only a puerile attempt to answer a serious charge, to say that it was because of the Hoover administration or protective tariff some years ago. The cotton market has been lost in the last 2 years, and you will lose it all if you continue the unsound and unworkable new-deal policies. But that is the kind of an answer we get from a cotton man from a cotton State, which State will be more completely ruined than any other by the total loss of the cotton export trade.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. Does the gentleman think the cotton farmers are getting too much for their cotton at the present time?

Mr. FISH. I am not opposed to the farmers getting everything they can get out of this administration or any other, but I say this. When you put the cost of cotton so high that you lose the world market for our greatest surplus exportable crop, you are ruining the farmer eventually and the entire South, because we cannot continue to pour out of the Treasury $250,000,000 a year to these farmers to reduce the cotton crop. We have spent $500,000,000 for reduction of the cotton crop and to buy 12-cent options. The gentleman knows this country has not enough money to continue any such policy, and for temporary profit we are losing the world market. The cotton bounty cannot be continued more than a year and by that time the world markets will be lost and difficult to regain.

Mr. BOILEAU. Would the gentleman advocate a reduction in the price of cotton temporarily?

Mr. FISH. What I advocate is that we should take over the surplus cotton and sell it for what we can get; not destroy the cotton or 25 percent of it or any amount of it; but sell it in the world's market and get what we can out of it and give it back to the farmers. We should try to preserve the world markets; not destroy them for our exportable surplus.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. As a matter of fact, when we reduced our production of cotton in this country, with a view to reducing our sales abroad, did we not, by that very act, say to all cotton-producing countries of the world, "Here is our foreign market. Take it"?

Mr. FISH. Of course. The whole policy has been for the benefit of the foreign producer in order to get our markets and they have gotten our foreign markets. Our farmers have got a temporary benefit out of the Treasury of the United States and mortgaged their future or, worse, destroyed their own permanent interests.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] has expired.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield the gentleman from New York 1 additional minute, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH].

Mr. SIROVICH. What I want to ask my distinguished colleague is this: 7 years ago and 9 years ago I heard this very same argument that the gentleman is making on the floor now, for the benefit of the cotton growers of our country. Two bills were passed, called the "McNary-Haugen bill", with the principle of debenture and equalization. I voted for those bills and they passed both the House and the Senate, but two Republican Presidents vetoed those bills.

Mr. FISH. I think the gentleman was right. I think we have got to go back to the McNary-Haugen bill or bounty plan for export, but certainly that is not what you have done. This administration has destroyed the world markets for our cotton and wheat exportable surplus.

Mr. SIROVICH. But a Republican President destroyed that by vetoing those bills.

Mr. FISH. That does not excuse the new-deal administration for losing the markets that we still had.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] has again expired.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU].

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I would like to state to the gentleman from New York, in view of the fact that he seems to favor an export debenture plan, that in a bill which the Committee on Agriculture will recommend to the House probably next week, known as "amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act", there is a provision which I recommend to the gentleman's earnest consideration.

Mr. FISH. I am for that kind of a provision.

Mr. BOILEAU. That will encourage exports by taking 30 percent of the money that we collect from tariff duties on other commodities and placing that in such a way as to benefit agriculture by encouraging exports of surplus agricultural commodities.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SNYDER], ranking member of the subcommittee.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I shall use 10 minutes of my time now and reserve the remaining 20 minutes for the closing debate on this bill Thursday or Friday.

I took some time to check up in the RECORD last Sunday to see what portion of the time spent on the floor by Members in speaking was devoted to constructive addresses and what portion was devoted to fault-finding addresses, without offering any constructive policies. I find that the average is about 29 to 1. About every 29 minutes is devoted to fault finding, without any constructive policy, out of every 30 minutes.

We have listened to quite a bit of that in the last speech especially.

I do not intend to take up any time today to discuss the legislative appropriation committee bill, except on one feature, and that is the Botanic Gardens. I think I will talk about flowers, trees, and beautiful gardens for 10 minutes, in order to take the minds of those who are here away from millions and millions.

Someone well said:

The riches of a commonwealth
Are free strong mind and hearts of health;
They are more to her than gold or grain,
The cunning hand and cultured brain.

However, we cannot help but think of Shakespeare and his Shylock day after day when we are talking of money and millions, millions and money. Mr. Chairman, there is more to be thought of than millions at this particular time. I am thinking of the heritage we are going to hand down to our children and our children's children. I am thinking of those things which go to bring about environment that will be a rich heritage to those who follow us.

To me, the Nation's Capital, and this 126 acres that belongs to the Capital, should be the most beautiful spot in the world. I want to commend the Republican side for their foresight. It was a Republican administration that brought about the building of the Botanic Gardens, and now we want to cooperate with them and they with us in bringing about a situation that in the space of 10 or 15 years will make the United States Capital the most outstanding and most beautiful spot in the world.

I would like to ask how many of you have ever been in the Botanic Garden? I asked one Member who had been here for 2 years, and he said he had never been near the Botanic Garden. I asked the same Member if he had ever been in the Congressional Library. He said he had never been inside the Congressional Library.

The Botanic Gardens, recently completed, are rapidly taking on an interior as well as an exterior that is commendable and commensurate with the rest of the environments up and down Constitution Avenue and here on Capitol Hill. With the completion of the Mall, First Street, and Maryland Avenue we have access to the Botanic Garden from all sides.

I do not know if you are familiar with Poplar Point or know where it is, but it is a tract of 12 acres that was purchased some years ago under the Republican administration—a good buy, by the way. The purpose is to utilize this tract of land to raise enough trees and shrubbery to transplant on Government property instead of having to pay out thousands and thousands of dollars each year to bring trees and shrubbery in from the outside. This is rapidly taking shape, and we have to give the Architect of the Capitol, Mr. Lynn, and his force a great deal of credit. Our thanks, too, are due Mr. Bardsee, the botanist, for bringing about these improved floral displays.

Just recently on a Sunday afternoon 5,200 people visited the Botanic Garden to see the floral display of azaleas. Congressmen now are putting on their list of things to be seen by their constituents the Botanic Gardens. When your constituents come here and want to know what they can see in a short time, by all means include the Botanic Gardens as well as the Library of Congress.

What a desolate place Capitol Hill would be were all the trees and shrubbery to be taken away. It would be as bad as the Midwest section and north Texas that has recently been devastated by the dust storms. What a beautiful sight right now this May as one approaches the Capitol and through the beautiful trees sees the dome of the Capitol reaching heavenward. Nature here has given us a setting that Washington intended should be perpetuated on down through the years. The beauty can be preserved through the years and be made more beautiful each year, my friends, simply by taking care of what Nature has given us.

In closing I ask the cooperation and support of every Member of Congress to bring about conditions that will make the Botanic Garden and the Capitol Grounds the most beautiful setting of any capitol in the world.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. The gentleman spoke of Congressmen who had not seen the Botanic Garden. I would like to say that I have been there four times since I have been a Member of the House. It is the most beautiful place I have seen in my 27 years of blindness.

I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows how I can get back my plants from the Botanic Garden? In other words, we used to be able to beautify our offices with plants and flowers. I was successful one year in obtaining some plants for my office, but this year I am unable to get them.

Mr. SNYDER. I will have to answer the gentleman by suggesting that he consult with the Architect of the Capitol, Mr. Lynn. I am sure Mr. Lynn can answer the gentleman.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman tell me what I can do to persuade him to give me back my plants?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield, I think the Committee on the Library has charge of that. A resolution was passed 2 years ago preventing any Member of Congress from receiving any plants or shrubs from the Botanic Garden. The Appropriations Committee has no jurisdiction whatsoever over legislative matters.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. But I am trying to find out how I can get back my plants.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. The gentleman will have to consult the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER], Chairman of the Library Committee.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Then, I will see the gentleman from Illinois. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 hour to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM].

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and amend my remarks, and also to add at the end of my remarks a letter to the State Department written by Matthew Woll, vice president of the American Federation of Labor, and also vice president of the Civic League.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WEST). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, I am constrained to object to the insertion of a letter from Matthew Woll to the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of State, or any other secretary.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, on November 16, 1933, the United States of America recognized the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. This recognition was a conditional recognition based upon several specific and exact pledges made in writing on behalf of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics by its People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs, Maxim Litvinoff. These pledges were accepted complacently at face value by the international socialists now in control of the Government of the United States. All of these pledges have been wholly repudiated.

The pledges purported to protect the United States from further communistic activities, and to guarantee against a continuance of the Communist organized effort to overthrow the Government of the United States and to substitute for the American form of government, a representative democracy with guaranties of the rights to property, the Soviet form of government known as the "dictatorship of the proletariat."

The repudiation of these pledges not only threatens the public safety of the United States, but is subversive of her social, economic, and political institutions, and destructive of her very existence.

Because of the repudiation of the pledges made on behalf of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, on January 3, 1935, I introduced a resolution in the House of Representatives proposing that the Congress recommend the severance of diplomatic relations with Soviet Russia. I then officially requested the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to set a date for a hearing on the resolution. At the end of several weeks a hearing was set for Tuesday, March 26. Competent witnesses came to Washington from various parts of the country to support my proposal with much indisputable documentary evidence. On the very morning of the date set for the hearing, after the witnesses were assembled at the Capitol prepared to present their evidence to the committee, the committee refused to hold the hearing or to accept the evidence unless I should agree not to refer on the floor of the House to any evidence that might be presented to the committee, even such evidence as was already in my possession.

The committee was plainly hostile to the resolution and obviously opposed to its favorable consideration. I therefore declined to subscribe to the apparent intention of the committee to suppress all evidence of the repudiation of the pledges upon which United States recognition was conditioned, to put it under seal, and to refuse to let the American people know the truth. The resolution was in the public interest. It involved the public safety of the United States. The people of the United States were entitled to know the facts.

Among the pledges given on November 16, 1933, by Maxim Litvinoff on behalf of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to obtain United States recognition were the following:

To refrain and to restrain all persons in Government service and all organizations of the Government or under its direct or indirect control, including organizations in receipt of any financial assistance from it, from any act overt or covert liable in any way whatsoever to injure the tranquillity, prosperity, order, or security of the whole or any part of the United States, its territories, or possessions, and, in particular, from any act tending to incite or encourage armed intervention, or any agitation or propaganda having as an aim the violation of the territorial integrity of the United States, its territories, or possessions, or the bringing about by force of a change in the political or social order of the whole or any part of the United States, its territories, or possessions.

And—

Not to permit the formation or residence on its territory of any organization or group—and to prevent the activity on its territory of any organization or group of or representatives or officials of any organization or group—which has as an aim the overthrow or the preparation for the overthrow of, or the bringing about by force of a change in, the political or social order of the whole or any part of the United States, its territories, or possessions.

Actual and indisputable evidence of the repudiation of these pledges was first laid before the State Department by Mr. Matthew Woll, acting president of the National Civic Federation and vice president of the American Federation of Labor, in a letter dated February 7, 1934, supplemented by a written memorandum accompanied by supporting documents. Further evidence of the repudiation of the Litvinoff pledges was submitted to the House Committee Investigating Un-American Activities at its hearing in New York on July 12, 1934, and at its hearing in Washington on December 17, 1934. The committee received and now has in its possession original and undisputed documents which show beyond reasonable doubt that there is in this country an organized movement seeking to prepare itself to seize and to destroy this Government by the use of force and to substitute for it the Soviet form of government known as the "dictatorship of the proletariat"; and that this movement is directed and controlled by the Communist International, a political organization which has been, and still is, located in Moscow within the territory of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and controlled by the Soviet Union.

In a report which the Committee Investigating Un-American Activities made to the House of Representatives on February 15, 1935, there appears the following:

In December 1934 it (the House Committee Investigating Un-American Activities) held a series of public hearings at Washington, D. C., at which representatives from various organizations and agencies that have recently been investigating communism presented statements of their findings accompanied by one or more recommendations.

The Communist Party of the United States is not a national political party concerned primarily and legitimately with conditions in this country. Neither does it operate on American principles for the maintenance and improvement of the form of government established by the organic law of the land.

The nature and extent of organized Communist activity in the United States have been established by testimony and the objectives of such activities clearly defined. Both from documentary evidence submitted to the committee and from the frank admission of Communist leaders (cf. Browder and Ford, New York hearing, July 12, 1934) these objectives include:

1. The overthrow by force and violence of the republican form of government guaranteed by article IV, section 4, of the Federal Constitution.

2. The substitution of a Soviet form of government, based on class domination to be achieved by abolition of elected representatives, both to the legislative and executive branches, as provided by article I, by the several sections of article II of the same Constitution, and by the fourteenth amendment.

3. The confiscation of private property by governmental decree, without the due process of law and compensation guaranteed by the fifth amendment.

4. Restriction of the rights of religious freedom, of speech, and of the press as guaranteed by the first amendment.

These specific purposes by Communist admission are to be achieved not by peaceful exercise of the ballot under constitutional right, but by revolutionary upheavals, by fomenting class hatred, by incitement to class warfare, and by other illegal, as well as by legal, methods. The tactics and specific stages to be followed for the accomplishment of this end are set forth in circumstantial detail in the official program of the American Communist Party adopted at the convention held at Cleveland on April 2 to 8, 1934.

The "manifesto" and the "resolutions" incite to civil war by requiring one class "to take power" by direct revolutionary process and then assume dictatorship over the country in the manner followed by the Communists in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, which is frequently mentioned as a guiding example.

In pursuance of the revolutionary way to power, the program instructs members of the party to obtain a foothold in the Army and Navy and develop "revolutionary mass organizations in the decisive war industries and in the harbors." The trade unions should be undermined and utilized as recruiting grounds for revolutionary workers. How faithfully these particular injunctions have been executed was demonstrated by Navy officers appearing before the committee and by officials of the American Federation of Labor.

The American Communist Party is affiliated with the Third International, which was created by officials of the Soviet Government and is still housed in Moscow with governmental approval and cooperation. This affiliation is not one of general sympathy or broad uniformity of purpose and program; it is of a definitely organic character involving specific jurisdiction on the part of the governing body over the Communist Party of the United States.

The executive secretary of the Communist Party of the United States testified to this committee that his party was "a section of the Communist International"; that it participates in all the gatherings which decide the policies of the Communist International and sends delegates to the various conferences in Moscow. This admission is confirmed by the records available.

Let us examine some of the documentary evidence which the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House refused to hear on March 26 last in support of the resolution proposing the severance of diplomatic relations with Soviet Russia. Let us see what are the damning facts concerning the repudiation of the pledges made to the United States Government on behalf of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to obtain United States recognition.

The Communist Party of the United States, with headquarters at 50 East Thirteenth Street, New York, N. Y., is the American section of the Communist International, a World Communist Party located at Moscow. This fact is plainly stated in the title of the Daily Worker, the party's official English language publication. The objects of the Communist International and the duties of its various sections are defined by the constitution and rules of that body. These will be found in a pamphlet entitled "Program of the Communist International", which is published by the Workers Library Publishers at 50 East Thirteenth Street, New York City. On page 88 of this pamphlet we read:

As the leader and organizer of the world revolutionary movement of the proletariat * * * the Communist International * * * fights for the establishment of the world dictatorship of the proletariat, for the establishment of a world Union of Socialist Soviet Republics. * * *

The second paragraph of the International Constitution, on the same page of the same document, shows that the orthodox Communist Party in each country is known as a section of the Communist International. Its supreme governing authority is "the world congress of representatives of all parties (sections) and organizations affiliated to the Communist International." (See paragraph 8, page 90 of the constitution.) This congress, which meets periodically in Moscow, "discusses and decides the program, tactical and organizational questions connected with the activities of the Communist International and of its various sections." Between congresses an executive committee "gives instructions to all the sections of the Communist International and controls their activity." (See paragraph 12, page 91 of the constitution.) The extent of this control is made clear by paragraph 13 of the constitution, which declares:

The decisions of the E. C. C. I. (the executive committee of the Communist International) are obligatory for all the sections of the Communist International and must be promptly carried out. The sections have the right to appeal against decisions of the E. C. C. I. to the world congress, but must continue to carry out such decisions pending the decision of the world congress.

And by paragraph 16 of the constitution, which provides:

The programs of the various sections of the Communist International must be endorsed by the E. C. C. I. * * *

In order to keep the executive committee of the Communist International in close touch with the parties in the several countries, it is empowered by paragraph 22 of the constitution:

To send their representatives to the various sections of the Communist International * * * Representatives of the E. C. C. I. are especially obliged to supervise the carrying out of the decisions of the world congresses and of the executive committee of the Communist International.

It thus appears that an organization known as the Communist International, located at Moscow within the territory of the Russian Government and controlled by the Soviet Union, has as its object the overthrow of existing governments in all other countries, including our own; has as its agency in each country a section known as the Communist Party of the given country, and that such Communist Party is subject to the direction and control of the executive committee of the Communist International residing at Moscow.

It should scarcely need argument to convince any reasonable person that the Communist International is an organization or group or, at the very least, representatives or officials of an organization or group, within the meaning of the Litvinoff pledges. Nor should it be necessary to point out that if this organization continued to function after the Litvinoff pledges were given to the United States and if the Russian Government made no attempts to limit its activities, then those pledges were violated.

What are the facts?

In mid-December 1933, one month after the Litvinoff pledges were given to the United States Government, the executive committee of the Communist International openly met at Moscow, under the walls of the Kremlin, and adopted resolutions designed to instruct its various sections upon the means they must employ and the activities in which they must engage in order to prepare to overthrow by force the governments of their respective countries. These resolutions pointed out:

There is no way out of the general crisis of capitalism other than the one shown by the October revolution, via the overthrow of the exploiting classes by the proletariat, the confiscation of the banks, of the factories, the mines, transport, houses, the stocks of goods of the capitalists, the lands of the landlords, the church, and the crown.

These resolutions, known as the Thesis of the Thirteenth Plenum of the Executive Committee of the Communist International, were published in English in the January 13, 1934, edition of the Daily Worker, the official organ of the Communist Party of the United States; and in the February issue of the Communist, an official monthly publication of the Communist Party of the United States. The October revolution referred to in this quotation is, of course, the Bolshevik revolution of 1917. It should be unnecessary to recall that this revolution was not a mere political overturn as the result of a general election or plebiscite, but rather was the result of a bloody civil war prosecuted by an organized and ruthless minority. These are facts of which we may take judicial notice. Here is an advocacy of the overturn of government by force, violence, and unlawful means.

The resolutions referred to closed with the following order:

The plenum of the E. C. C. I. (the executive committee of the Communist International) obliges all sections of the Communist International to be on their guard at every turn of events, and to exert every effort without losing a moment for the revolutionary preparation of the proletariat for the impending decisive battles for power. (See p. 144 of the February issue of the Communist.)

Here is a specific instruction from a Moscow organization to the sections of the Communist International, of which the Communist Party of the United States is one, that they must exert every effort to prepare the proletariat for the decisive battles for power. Here the American Communist Party receives an order from Moscow to work for the overthrow by force of the Government of the United States.

If there were any doubt as to what means are intended and for what preparations are to be made, they are removed by the statement in the Communist International, the English-language organ of the Communist International. On page 87 we read:

The general strike and armed uprising are the only road for the proletariat in its struggle to put an end to the domination of capital and conquer power and establish socialism.

Such instructions were, in fact, received in the United States from Russia subsequent to the Litvinoff pledges and were approved by the central committee of the Communist Party of the United States at a meeting held in New York City on January 16, 1934. That committee adopted a resolution at that meeting which opens with the following paragraph:

The eighteenth meeting of the central committee, C. P. U. S. A. (the Communist Party of the United States of America) fully accepts and endorses the analysis of the present world situation and the decisions of the Thirteenth Plenum of the Executive Committee of the Communist International. (See p. 178 of the February 1934 issue of The Communist.)

The Thesis of the Thirteenth Plenum adopted by the executive committee of the Communist International at its meeting in Moscow in mid-December 1933 in its opening session declares:

The tremendous strains of the internal class antagonisms in the capitalist countries, as well as of the international antagonisms, testify to the fact that the objective prerequisites for a revolutionary crisis have matured to such an extent that at the present time the world is closely approaching a new round of revolution and wars.

In reviewing the American situation, the resolution adopted by the central committee of the Communist Party of the United States at its meeting held in New York City on January 16, 1934, states:

Clearly, Roosevelt's program, with its Fascist and war objectives, is also leading to the sharpening of all class antagonisms throughout the country and is placing on the agenda, here also, the problem of the revolutionary way out of the crisis, the revolutionary seizure of power by the toiling masses, the proletarian revolution. The objective prerequisites for a revolutionary crisis are maturing. (See p. 179 of the February 1934 issue of the Communist.)

The militant program of the Thirteenth Plenum, thus approved by the central committee of the Communist Party of the United States, was later approved also by the Eighth National Convention of the Communist Party held at Cleveland, Ohio, April 2-8, 1934. This convention constitutes the supreme governing body of the Communist Party in this country. In one of the resolutions adopted to carry out the decisions of the executive committee of the Communist International we find the statement:

All members of the party must, in their day-to-day work in the fight for the demands of the workers, point out convincingly and insistently that only the destruction of the capitalist system, the establishment of the dictatorship of the proletariat, of the soviet power, can free the millions of toilers from the bondage and misery of the capitalist system. (See p. 453, May 1934 issue of the Communist.)

For the general instruction of those not familiar with communism, the party has prepared a booklet published by the Workers' Library Publishers, 50 East Thirteenth Street, New York City, entitled "Why Communism?", which has run through many editions. On page 44 of the March 1934 issue it is stated:

We Communists say that there is one way to abolish the capitalist state, and that is to smash it by force. To make communism possible the workers must take hold of the State machinery of capitalism and destroy it.

The most concise statement I have yet seen of the program planned by the Communist Party for the overthrow of our Government appears in the election program adopted by the party for the congressional and State elections last fall. I quote from page 23 of the election platform of the Communist Party of New York State, 1934. It says:

The revolutionary way out of the crisis begins with the fight for unemployment insurance, against wage cuts, for wage increases, for relief to the farmers—through demonstrations, strikes, general strikes leading up to the seizure of power, to the destruction of capitalism by a revolutionary workers' government.

This then is the road the Communist Party has chosen to follow. In doing so the head of its Agit Prop Bureau (agitation propaganda bureau) points out to new members that:

Lenin maintained, the only way in which we can make the situation for capitalism really hopeless is by defeating the efforts of the capitalist class to find a capitalist way out of the crisis—that is, by arousing the widest masses to organized resistance against the capitalist offensive, by developing in the daily struggles of the proletarian counteroffensive, and by convincing the masses of the need of a revolutionary way out of the crisis. (See p. 20 of the booklet entitled "The Communist Party in Action", by Alex Bittelman, published by the Workers' Library Publishers, 50 East Thirteenth Street, New York.)

Mr. Walter Lippmann, in the New York Herald Tribune of February 5, 1935, observes:

A free nation can tolerate much and ordinarily toleration is its best defense. It can tolerate feeble Communist parties and feeble Fascist parties as long as it is certain that they have no hope of success. But once they cease to be debating societies and become formidable organizations for action they present a challenge which it is suicidal to ignore. They use liberty to assemble force to destroy liberty. When that challenge is actually offered, when it really exists in the judgment of the sober and the well informed, it is a betrayal of liberty not to defend it with all the power that free men possess.

The question is, Are these plans and purposes of the Communist International and its American section, the Communist Party of the United States, merely the vaporings of a debating society?

Let us see what the Communist Party is actually doing in this country to carry out its objectives.

The evidence presented before the House Committee Investigating Un-American Activities has made it perfectly plain to any sober and intelligent student that the activities of these organizations have become much more real than mere debates, plans, or hopes. That evidence shows beyond reasonable doubt that active measures are being taken on many fields to recruit sufficient Communist strength to make the attempt to overturn our Government by force. These preparatory efforts may not yet have been sufficiently fruitful to present grave danger of such an overturn at once, but the facts do show that they constitute a constant threat in times such as these, and that with an aggravation of our present economic situation they would become a great peril to the maintenance of our Government. In fact, the evidence does show that they are at present a constant threat to the industrial peace of the country and already have provoked and have protracted some of the most violent and bloody industrial disturbances in this country during the past year.

In the resolutions of the thirteenth plenum, adopted 1 month after the giving of the pledges by Maxim Litvinoff, the executive committee of the Communist International made these demands upon its various sections:

(a) That the content and language of agitation and the press must henceforth be addressed to the broadest strata of the proletariat and the toilers, showing the face of the Communist Parties in both agitation and in mass action (demonstrations, strikes, and other mass actions).

(b) Securing within the shortest time possible a decisive turn to the work in the factories, concentrating the forces of the party organization in the decisive enterprises and raising the political level of the leadership given by the factory nuclei to the daily class struggles.

(c) Putting an end to the opportunist, defeatist, neglect of trade-union work, and in particular work inside the reformist trade-unions.

(d) Really developing mass work among the unemployed.

(e) Intensifying revolutionary work in the rural districts.

(f) Increasing mass work among women.

(g) Putting an end to the narrowness of the Y. C. L. (the Youth Communist League).

(See pp. 141-142, February 1934 issue of the Communist.)

Since United States recognition of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics the Communist Party of the United States has devoted itself intensively to carrying out these unequivocal orders of its superior at Moscow, and Communist activities in the United States have been greatly increased.

It has been indicated that the Communist Party relies primarily upon the general strike as an effective weapon for destroying our Government. Obviously, if this weapon is to be effective, that party must have control of large masses of individuals, particularly wage earners. It is using every means at its command to gain such control. On the industrial field the steps taken by it are threefold:

First. It is organizing the unorganized, unskilled, or semi-skilled workers into revolutionary industrial unions;

Second. It is organizing militant rank-and-file oppositions within the recognized unions of the American Federation of Labor; and Third. It has created councils among the unemployed workers and those upon relief.

All of these activities are directed by an affiliated agency of the Communist Party, until recently known as the Trade Union Unity League, with headquarters at 80 East Eleventh Street, New York City, and now known as the Committee for the Unification of Trade Unions. Already a large number of such revolutionary industrial unions have been organized under Communist leadership, each with its own periodical publication, each with the object of using the strike for political purposes when the appropriate moment comes. A large number of rank-and-file organizations have already been created in unions of the American Federation of Labor which are guided by special publications, of which the A. F. of L. Rank and File Federationist is typical.

The part played by these various agencies in the great industrial disturbances of the past year is frankly admitted in official Communist publications. For example, the serious Auto-Lite strike in Toledo, Ohio, last April was Communist-led and the violence was traceable directly to the activities of the Communist groups there and affiliated unemployed councils. The part played by these bodies in that strike is frankly told in the July 1934 issue of The Communist. On page 640 of that issue it is stated:

Above all, the Toledo workers went through 10 days of intensive political training in which the class lines were sharply drawn.

What the Communists meant by political training is made clear, for the article proceeds:

While it is true that the fighting did not yet involve machine-gun shooting (although there were plenty in evidence) or heavier weapons, nevertheless the whole line-up of workers against the capitalist State, and the methods of struggle in a hitherto typical middle-sized industrial city is very symptomatic. The quick development from isolated strike struggles to bloody mass battles involving the bulk of the working population, shop workers, unemployed, Negro, women, and quickly spreading to the general strike preparations, such as we have seen in Toledo, is something new in the situation (p. 642).

Similar evidence is available showing the Communist leadership in the violence which characterized the strikes in San Francisco, Portland, Minneapolis, Centralia, Gastonia, Woonsocket, and elsewhere.

The progress made by the party in this particular field of effort may be measured by the fact that in these organizations the Communists have already recruited approximately 500,000 persons throughout the country. To give consideration to the Trade Union Unity League alone, a resolution of the Eighth Convention of the Communist Party of the United States, held April 2 to 8, 1934, referring to the last year, says:

The T. U. U. L. (the Trade Union Unity League) unions, which recruited some 100,000 new members, led strikes of some 200,000 workers. (See p. 463, May 1934 issue of the Communist.)

It thus appears that the Communist Party of the United States is not simply a debating society but has advanced materially in the direction of preparing itself to use violence as the means of seizing and destroying the powers of government.

It is a shocking commentary upon the somnolence of the American people that they have permitted the Government itself to become an accomplice of the Communist Party in building these revolutionary industrial unions. I refer to the interpretations of section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act which have forced reluctant employers to recognize and to deal with representatives of revolutionary industrial unions and which have sanctioned the coercion of reluctant employees into membership in such unions. It is scarcely credible but it is a fact that the full powers of Federal Government have been used to encourage, to aid, and to abet the forging of instruments designed for its own destruction.

A typical example of this is the Government pressure brought to bear upon a large clothing dealer in New York City, Samuel Klein. The union involved is the Office Workers Union which "is affiliated with the Trade Union Unity League." (See p. 8, November 1934 issue of the Office Worker.)

Let me read an editorial from the Daily Worker of February 4, 1935, which describes the result of Klein's appeal to the National Labor Relations Board:

The strike of the S. Klein clothing store workers, who have been out since November 17, has been settled with gains for the workers. The over 60 workers fired for membership in the Office Workers Union are to be on the preferential list for rehiring; the strikers receive 5 weeks wages for the time lost, and Gertrude Lane, secretary of the union, has a certified check for this; a deposit is placed in a bank, and will be forfeited if Joseph Brodsky, noted labor attorney, decides that Klein at any time breaks the agreement.

It should be known that Joseph Brodsky is the attorney for the International Labor Defense, a mass organization of the Communist Party of the United States. In this instance, the power of the National Government has been used directly to forward the Communist program for the overturn of government by force.

During the past year the policy of the Communist Party in the industrial field has undergone a very marked change. Heretofore the party has attacked the American Federation of Labor as a fascist and reactionary organization. But the large number of recruits taken into the unions affiliated with that body, who formerly have been unorganized, and a changing temper in the growing groups of wage earners throughout the country generally has lead the Communist Party to change its attitude toward the American Federation of Labor. It is now devoting the major part of its energy toward organizing and gaining control of the revolutionary rank-and-file oppositions within the unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

In speaking of this change of policy, Alex Bittelman, in the March 1935 issue of the Communist, referring particularly to criticisms of the conservative leadership of the American Federation of Labor, says:

We must do it, not as outsiders but as part of the unions, fighting for a different policy than the reactionaries and trying to convince and win the workers for our class-struggle policies as against the class collaboration reactionary policies (p. 256).

For this reason the A. F. of L. Rank and File Federationist is now being widely circulated. This change in front is so marked that at the convention of the Trade Union Unity League, held about 2 months ago in New York City, it was decided to terminate that organization in its present form. The report of the convention, published in the Daily Worker of March 18, 1935, says:

With this convention the Trade Union Unity League, as it has been constituted, was terminated, in line with the struggle which has been going on for months, with considerable success, for merger of the unions affiliated to the T. U. U. L. (the Trade Union Unity League) with the American Federation of Labor unions. (See p. 1 of the Mar. 18 issue of the Daily Worker.)

In other words, the work of Trade Union Unity League will now be carried on under the name "Committee for the Unification of Trade Unions."

As evidence of the progress made in "boring within" the conservative unions, I quote from an editorial in the Daily Worker for February 5, 1935. The editorial states:

Strike preparations must be made now. The unorganized steel workers must be brought into the American Federation of Labor now, before the present busy production season is over. The rank and file in the American Federation of Labor auto locals must act now to build their unions and prepare the strike.

This solicitude for recruiting American Federation of Labor unions in these fields would not be shown by the Communist Party of the United States unless it felt confident that it would have a controlling voice in them.

A separate organization directly affiliated with the Communist International is the Young Communist League. One of the sections of the Communist International is the national League of Communist Youth, popularly known as "Communist Youth International." Its relation to the parent body is defined in paragraph 35 of the Constitution and Rules of the Communist International.

The Young Communist League of the United States is the American agency of the Communist Youth International. Its program is published in a pamphlet by the Young Communist League of America, 43 East One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street, New York City. It says:

The Y. C. L. (the Young Communist League) is the school of communism for the toiling youth, but "the growing young generation can only learn communism by linking up every step in its training and education with the incessant struggle of the proletariat and the toiling masses against the old exploiting society" (p. 34).

Its task is to organize within its ranks not only the advanced elements but the broad masses of the toiling youth (p. 35).

The program of this organization is frankly not confined to legal measures. On page 40, the program says:

The Y. C. L. (the Young Communist League) does not limit its activity to the framework of "legality" ordained by the bourgeois. In its struggle against capitalism, the Y. C. L. is continually compelled to combine its open legal activity with illegal and semi-legal work and therefore to overstep the limits laid down for it by bourgeois legality.

The membership book of the league contains the following pledge and rules:

Upon joining the Young Communist League, I pledge to be a loyal fighter for the everyday interests of the working class and the toiling youth. To further do all in my power to learn and become a conscious leader amongst the young workers, wherever I may be, in the struggle against the boss class and for the establishment of a workers' and farmers' government.

The rules follow:

- "1. Every member must be active in the unit.
- "2. A member must pay dues regularly to the unit.
- "3. He must join his trade union and be active there.
- "4. Every member in the shop should work for the building of a unit in the factory.
- "5. A member should attend fraction meetings of the trade union or organization of which he is a member.
- "6. The member should read working-class literature, subscribe to the Daily Worker, and attend study circles and classes, to become more developed and trained in the working-class movement."

This is by no means a paper organization. It is active in schools and colleges throughout the country, in factories, and in shops. It has aided and encouraged demonstrations against military service, against the R. O. T. C. and the defensive measures of Government. On page 13 of "A Program for American Youth", adopted at the seventh national convention of the league on June 22-27, 1934, will be found the following statement:

Through the application of the united front the Y. C. L. (the Young Communist League) in the last year helped to develop an antiwar youth movement, organized a whole series of antiwar conferences and actions and in the past 3 years succeeded in transforming Memorial Day into a traditional day of struggle against war and fascism.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. Is the gentleman quoting newspaper articles conveying this information or does he have the specific information from direct investigation?

Mr. TINKHAM. All that I have quoted is contained in documents that are here on this table.

In January 1934, two months after the Litvinoff pledges were given to the United States Government, a full meeting of the executive committee of the Young Communist International met at Moscow. A pamphlet published by the Young Publishers, the official printing house of the Young Communist League in this country, post-office box 28, station D, New York City, contains the report made to this meeting by V. E. Chemadanov, who is secretary of the Young Communist International and chairman of the Russian delegation.

In this report appears the following:

The masses of the toiling youth can and must be won to the side of communism, through developing the propaganda of Leninist teachings among them, through mobilizing them for economic and political fights, through leading them to the barricades under the leadership of the Communist Party (p. 41).

It should be quite apparent that this report issued to the American party, as well as others of a similar nature, constitutes a clear violation not only of the spirit but also of the letter of the Litvinoff pledges.

A very considerable amount of progress has been made by this organization among the agencies formed in connection with it. The Young Pioneer deserves especial mention. It is a sort of preparatory school for the Young Communist League. The New Pioneer, a monthly publication, is gotten out in its interest, and is designed to stimulate class hatred among very young children. These have been organized into troops similar in formation to the Boy Scouts. Summer camps for Young Pioneer troops have been conducted in various parts of the country. It is claimed that the membership in them has trebled the last 2 years, increasing from 4,000 to 12,000. (See p. 12 of A Program for American Youth.)

In passing, it should be said that each Communist organization has its youth section which is actively engaged in circulating destructive propaganda as well as affording amusement and entertainment for children of wage earners.

As a part of the work of preparing for the forceful overthrow of government, the Communist Party has recognized the imperative need of trained leadership. To that end, it has established a large number of workers' schools in the principal industrial centers throughout the United States. These schools are under the guidance and direction of the Workers School located at 35 East Twelfth Street, New York City. Its purpose is described in the foreword of its winter term announcement, as follows:

The Workers School is not an academic institution. It participates in all the current struggles of the working class. It takes part in strikes, campaigns, and demonstrations; it supplies speakers, agitators, and organizers; it stimulates working-class educational and cultural movements and various studies; and it cooperates with workers' fraternal and cultural organizations in the establishment of forums, classes, and study circles (p. 2).

The foreword also says:

From a mere handful in 1923 our registration grew to 6,000 in 1933-34.

It is still growing rapidly.

Following are only a few of the workers' schools affiliated with this Communist organization:

Name of school	Location	From the Daily Worker (date of issue)
Harlem Workers School, Wm. Burroughs, director.	200 West 135th Street, New York City.	May 2, 1934
Los Angeles Workers School.....	Workers Cultural Center, 230 Spring Street, Los Angeles, Calif.	Do.
Boston Workers School.....	919 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.	Do.
Summer Workers School (under the Workers School of New York).	Camp Nitgodaiget and Camp Unity.	July 24, 1934
Chicago Workers School.....	Central School with branches on Northwest Side and South Side of Chicago, South Chicago and Gary, is located at 505 South State Street.	Aug. 14, 1934
Northwest Side Workers School.....	Northwest Side Workers Center, Chicago.	Aug. 14, 1934
South Chicago Workers School.....	9133 Baltimore Street, Chicago....	Do.
Cleveland Workers School.....	1524 Prospect Avenue.....	Do.
Brownsville Workers School.....	1855 Pitkin Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.	Sept. 11, 1934
Workers School, Peoria.....	725 1/2 South Evans Street, Peoria, Ill.	Do.
Philadelphia Workers School.....	908 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.	Nov. 20, 1934
Functionaries School.....	Schenectady, N. Y.....	Do.
Washington Workers School.....	513 F Street NW., Washington, D. C.	Do.

This institution has associated with it a large number of subsidiary organizations designed to stimulate interest in the school, to cater to the social life of the student, and to increase its registration. Among these may be mentioned Friends of the Workers School, a Students' Council, the Theatre of the Workers' School, and the Workers' School Forum. The purposes and functions of these organizations are mentioned in the winter term announcement.

Mr. Matthew Woll, in his testimony before the Congressional Committee Investigating Un-American Activities, on December 17, 1934, called attention to an extraordinary state of affairs. Mr. Woll said:

In carrying out this workers' educational program, the Communist movement has received substantial aid from an unexpected quarter. I refer to schools established this year under the Division of Emergency Education Projects of the Federal Relief Administration.

Mr. Woll also pointed out that these schools were designed to bring together unemployed teachers and unoccupied working-class students at the taxpayers' expense. He testified that the Federal Bureau at Washington issued suggestions for the organization, curricula, and teaching to be carried on in these schools; that it issued a bibliography entitled "Books, Pamphlets, and Other Materials Recommended for Libraries of Training Centers for Workers' Education and Teachers of Workers' Education." He called attention to the fact that on page 2, under the head of "Labor Papers", the first four recommended for use in connection with the schools were: New Leader, 7 East Fifteenth Street, New York, Socialist; Labor Action, 112 East Nineteenth Street, New York, American Workers Party, a schismatic Communist group; Workers' Age, 51 West Fourteenth Street, New York, Communist opposition, representing the Trotsky section of revolutionary communism; the Daily Worker, 50 East Thirteenth Street, New York, Communist.

Mr. Woll also said:

We thus find the Federal Government itself recommending that unemployed teachers use periodicals whose object, with the exception of the first mentioned, is to teach their readers how to destroy our Government by force and violence. To be sure, other books, pamphlets, and documents are recommended by the Bureau, but a very large percentage of these present the point of view of the class struggle.

As recently as Saturday last the press reported that the Federal Grand Jury Association for the Southern District of New York had charged that Federal Emergency Relief Administration funds were being used "to finance classes in communism" and to teach some 20,000 students "how to bring about a general strike, to seize and operate industry, particularly munitions plants, and how to overthrow the Government and establish a Soviet Union."

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Who made that statement?

Mr. TINKHAM. That was made only last Saturday by the Federal Grand Jury Association for the Southern District of New York.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. TINKHAM. It is, of course, impossible for me to give a full description of the actual activities being carried on by the Communist Party pursuant to the orders received from Moscow. I should fail, however, to give a true picture if I neglected to point out that, in addition to the direct party agencies, it has caused the creation of and directs the activities of auxiliary and subsidiary organizations.

Among the auxiliary organizations may be mentioned the International Workers Order, with headquarters at 80 Fifth Avenue, New York City, which is ostensibly a mutual-benefit association providing sick benefits, life insurance, and medical services, and so forth, to its members at low cost. It has, however, following the provisions of its bylaws, organized "agitation and cultural activities among its members with a view to creating amongst them an understanding of the need of these struggles to break down amongst them illusory barriers of race, creed, and color; to establish amongst them the practice of class solidarity, and to develop in them working-class consciousness, and, finally, to win them for the struggle for a workers' and farmers' government in America." (See p. 6 of the constitution and bylaws of the organization.)

Considerable progress has been made in developing this organization in recent months. Its membership has jumped from forty to sixty thousand.

Another organization of national scope is the International Labor Defense. This is a section of the International Red Aid of Moscow and is described as:

"A broad nonparty organization based on the class struggle which aims to defend all workers who are being persecuted by the capitalist government and various other agencies of the employing class for their participation in the class struggle by rendering legal aid, moral, and financial support to these workers and their dependents by wide publicity, organizing mass demonstrations of support and protest, both here and abroad." (See p. 10 of the Constitution and Organization Resolution, adopted at its fourth national convention, held in Pittsburgh, Pa., December 29-31, 1929, which is still in force.)

The national headquarters of this organization is at 80 East Eleventh Street, New York City. Its official organ is the Labor Defender.

The Friends of the Soviet Union, with headquarters in the same place as the International Labor Defense, is still another auxiliary organization whose purpose it is to win the interest and support of non-Communists in the Russian Soviet Union and in its aspirations for world domination. It is the American section of the International Friends of the Soviet Union, located at Amsterdam, Holland.

Among its specific purposes outlined in a leaflet entitled "Who Are the Friends of the Soviet Union?" we find, on page 8:

To mobilize all elements who are sympathetic to the Soviet Union for the struggle against the war preparations of the imperialists.

In commenting upon this purpose, Mr. Matthew Woll called attention to its significance in the light of an editorial in the Daily Worker of June 13, 1934, which said:

Civil war against "our own" Government, to work for the defeat of American imperialism in the next war, no matter whether it is "defensive" or "offensive"—that is the only truly revolutionary policy—in the interests of the working class.

Soviet Russia Today is the official organ of this organization. In July 1934 it claimed a monthly circulation of 24,000.

Among the subsidiary organizations designed to recruit the strength of the Communist Party, one of particular importance is the League of Struggle for Negro Rights, which is intended to spread Communist propaganda among the Negro population in our country and which is actively engaged in doing so.

Earl Browder, the executive secretary of the Communist Party of the United States, said in his report to the eighteenth plenary meeting of the central committee of the party on January 16, 1934:

It is necessary to say a few words about the most general aspect of the struggle for Negro liberation and the efforts to give this struggle organizational form in the League of Struggle for Negro Rights. * * * It is necessary to give first place also to the development of such organizations as the Share-Croppers' Union. But the necessity for emphasis upon these basic forms of organization in no way relieves us of the duty of organizing the general liberation movement of the Negroes, as we have outlined these proposals for the building of the League of Struggle for Negro Rights and its paper, the Liberator. This is one of the tasks of the day for the entire party organization. That means developing mass activities, not leaving it on paper, not leaving it in the realm of abstract propaganda, but developing tasks for the local organizations upon the basis of the general program laid down." (See p. 171 of the Communist, issue of February 1934.)

The headquarters of this organization is 2162 Seventh Avenue, New York City.

Still another subsidiary organization is the National Student League, which is an outgrowth of the activities of the Young Communist League and of the Communist Party generally. A resolution on "The Winning of the Working-Class Youth Is The Task of the Entire Party" was adopted at the national convention of the Communist Party held at Cleveland in April 1934. In this resolution we find the following:

While building the National Student League as the broadest revolutionary mass student organization, they (referring to the Communist Party) must bring forth the independent role of the Young Communist League and recruit the class-conscious students for its ranks. (See p. 487, May 1934, issue of the Communist.)

The intimate relationship between the Young Communist League and the National Student League is made perfectly clear in "A Program for American Youth", already mentioned. On page 21 it says:

The Y. C. L. (the Young Communist League) must work to build the National Student League into a broad mass organization. Every section and district committee must apply the principles of concentration and control tasks to the organization of the N. S. L. (the National Student League) in the schools in its local city, especially in the high and evening schools, where the students are in greater numbers proletarian in origin.

This organization has been growing rapidly, and it appears that as long ago as December 1933—

The N. S. L. (the National Student League) has 50 active functioning groups throughout the United States. There are 44 groups not N. S. L. (National Student League), but under N. S. L. leadership. We also have contacts in 35 colleges, making a total of 129 colleges and universities in which the N. S. L. has influence. (See p. 57 of the National Student League Year Book for 1933.)

These figures, of course, do not include the high-school section, on which there seem to be no statistical data available.

The official national publication of this organization is the Student Review, a monthly magazine.

There are, however, a number of district organizations issuing newspapers, and some of the college chapters also issue student newspapers.

It is interesting to note that the National Student League also maintains a school at 257 Seventh Avenue, New York City, formerly at 114 West Fourteenth Street. Its bulletin describes its purpose to be: (1) To bring before the students an understanding of the foundations of society; (2) to bring to the fore the day-to-day issues which face the students. In view of the Communist affiliations, it is quite evident what these are.

Besides the organizations which I have mentioned as being directly affiliated with the Communist Party or subsidiary to it, there are others which may properly be described as United Front organizations in which the Communist Party of the United States has a dominating influence. Perhaps the most active of these at the present time is the American League Against War and Fascism, of which Earl Browder, executive secretary of the Communist Party, is the active vice chairman. The national headquarters of this body is located at 112 East Nineteenth Street, New York City. It is made up of Communists and some Socialists. It also has its youth section. The Communist Party takes a vital interest in its promotion.

At the eighth convention of the Communist Party of the United States in April 1934, a resolution on "The Winning of the Working Class Youth" was adopted. In paragraph 5 of this resolution we find the following:

The party and league (referring to the Young Communist League) must guarantee an immediate improvement of the anti-militarist and antiwar activity. * * * (b) a broad united-front movement of youth must be built around the American League Against War and Fascism. Broad city and State conferences of youth against war and fascism must be organized and antiwar committees set up in shops, ports, neighborhoods, and mass organizations. (See p. 485 of the Communist, issue of May 1934.)

This organization held its second national congress at Chicago, Ill., on September 28-30, 1934, at which the total number of delegates registered was 3,332, the number of youth delegates being 749. (See p. 22 of the proceedings of that convention.)

In the September 1934 issue of Fight, the official publication of this organization, Earl Browder asks the question: "What progress have we made in carrying out the program?" He mentions a few outstanding measures:

1. The growth of the youth section and its activities, which have extended and activated the broad united front to include about everything healthy and living in its field—student-strike movement, a national youth-day series of mass demonstrations, dozens of conferences, publications, etc.
2. The women's committee, and especially its mass campaign for election of the broad delegation to the Women's World Congress Against War and Fascism in Paris.
3. The growingly successful publication of the monthly journal, Fight Against War and Fascism, which has won a secure and honorable place for itself purely on its merits.
4. The mass demonstration and parades on August 4, the twentieth anniversary of the World War, which in some places, as New York City, revealed an unexpected degree of mass interest and active support for the American League and disclosed really great potentialities (p. 5).

The manifesto of the American League Against War and Fascism, adopted at the Chicago convention, reveals its purpose, which is as follows:

To support the peace policies of the Soviet Union for total and universal disarmament, which today with the support of the masses of all countries constitutes the greatest and most effective opposition to war throughout the world; to oppose all attempts to weaken the Soviet Union, whether these take the form of misrepresentation and false propaganda, diplomatic maneuvering, or intervention by imperialist government.

The stand of the youth section of the league is made amply plain in the Youth Manifesto Against War and Fascism. On pages 6, 7, and 8 of that document you will find the pledge of its membership. I need quote only the first article:

1. We pledge to fight the efforts to militarize our generation. We will fight against all open and concealed efforts to train young people for war.

The last line of defense of democratic government in case of serious internal disorders is the National Guard and the Regular Army and Navy. For this reason, so long as these bodies remain loyal to their oaths, the chances of the overturn of our Government by force and violence are remote. None recognizes this fact better than the Communist Party of the United States, and for this reason intensive efforts are being made to spread the Communist doctrine and to win support for the Communist program in military, naval, and National Guard circles. This activity follows the specific instructions received by the Communist Party from the executive committee of the Third International subsequent to the giving of the Litvinoff pledges to the United States Government as a condition of recognition. Those instructions order the various sections of the International to "intensify political educational work in the Army and in the Navy." (See p. 140 of the February 1934 issue of the Communist.)

In obedience to this instruction, the Communist Party has established nuclei in the Army, Navy, and in several navy yards. The Soldiers' Voice, the Shipmates' Voice, and the Navy Yard Worker are clandestinely circulated among enlisted men. Booklets are published by the Workers Library Publishers, the official publishing house of the Communist Party of the United States, intended to encourage insubordination in Army, Navy, and National Guard circles.

In the Litvinoff pledges there was an engagement on the part of the Russian Government—

To refrain and to restrain all persons in Government service and all organizations of the Government or under its direct or indirect control, including organizations in receipt of any financial assistance from it, from any act overt or covert liable in any way whatsoever to injure the tranquillity, prosperity, order, or security of the whole or any part of the United States or its possessions. * * *

Let us refer once more to the resolutions of the Thirteenth Plenum held at Moscow one month after the giving of the Litvinoff pledges. These resolutions contained the following statement:

It is necessary to unfold before the toilers of each country a program which, basing itself on the experience of the great triumphs of the Soviet workers and collective farmers on all fronts of the class struggle and Socialist construction, should, while making allowance for the peculiar conditions of the different countries, show what the Soviet power will give them in their own country.

In defining the meaning of "soviet power" the Plenum says:

The soviet power is the state form of the proletariat dictatorship.

It appears, therefore, that an important part of the program for preparing the proletariat of this country for the overthrow of our Government includes the presentation of enticing pictures of what soviet power gives to the proletariat in Soviet Russia. In furtherance of this program, a large number of propaganda documents have been and are still being printed in Russia under Government supervision and sold in the United States by the International Publishers, of 381 Fourth Avenue, New York City. A very considerable number of these documents are printed in the English language for use in English-speaking countries.

A typical example of this "made in Russia" propaganda is a booklet entitled "Youth in the Soviet Union." In this booklet we read on page 9:

How, indeed, can capitalism find occupation for youth and afford it access to the heights of science, technique, and art when capitalism itself is in the throes of a crisis of unprecedented severity, when it is constantly cutting down production, when crisis and unemployment are the necessary and inevitable consequences of the capitalistic method of production, when world capitalism is in a state of general crisis, which, despite occasional periods of temporary stabilization, is leading capitalism to ruin and collapse? No; it is beyond the power of capitalism to find a place in life for youth, the more so in the epoch of imperialism, the epoch of general crisis.

Many booklets of this same type, published in Russia in the English language, are being imported into this country in direct violation of the engagement entered into by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics at the time of its recognition by the United States Government.

Obviously, what I have said is not sufficiently full to give a complete picture of the extent of which these Communist activities are being carried on throughout the United States. They do show, however—

First. That the Communist International, acting upon Russian territory and controlled by the Soviet Union, has, since the giving of the Litvinoff pledges, directed the Communist Party of the United States and the Young Communist League of America to use every available means to prepare for the forceful overthrow of our Government, by propaganda and the organization of revolutionary trade unions, leagues, committees, and groups, and for the substitution in its place of a soviet form of government to be affiliated with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Second. That the Communist Party and the Young Communist League of America have accepted this militant program and are using every effort to recruit their strength for that purpose, and that they have been aided and encouraged by section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act and through funds dispensed by the Federal Emergency Relief Administration.

Third. That this action on the part of the Communist International is a complete repudiation of the Litvinoff pledges.

Fourth. That the publication in the English language in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics for use in the United States of books and pamphlets attacking our form of government and their shipment to this country also constitutes a complete repudiation of the Litvinoff pledges.

The evidence discloses that there has been an organized Nation-wide, systematic and rapidly developing attempt to undermine the institutions of the United States and to overthrow its Government. An official committee of the House of Representatives has certified to the truth of this statement.

This evidence discloses also that since the recognition by the United States of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics there have been a great increase in communistic activities and an enhancement of the prestige of those in control of them.

This undisputed evidence from Russian and American sources shows that the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics promotes these activities to undermine the institutions of the United States and to overthrow its Government in complete repudiation of the pledges which it gave to obtain United States recognition.

Since the Russian Government has failed to respect the pledges upon which United States recognition was conditioned, diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union should be severed at once.

Refusal of those in authority to sever diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union places a serious responsibility upon the Congress of the United States.

Officials of the United States Government are bound by their oath of office to "defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic." An official of the Government who violates his oath of office is subject to impeachment.

In the light of the evidence now in its possession it becomes the duty of the Congress to determine whether or not officials of the Government who refuse to take action to defend the Constitution against a foreign enemy, and who permit public funds to be expended to teach subversive doctrines and to forward a program to overthrow the Government are subject to impeachment.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I should greatly appreciate it if the gentleman from New Jersey would kindly give me an extension of time.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, I am going to object to any extension on the ground that the gentleman already has consumed 1 hour. For him to consume more time would be unfair to the other Members who desire to speak. I am sure there will be no objection to his extending his remarks in the Record.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I requested unanimous consent to extend my remarks at the time I began to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules, the gentleman may not speak more than an hour unless it is by unanimous consent, and objection has been raised. Without objection, the gentleman will be allowed to revise and extend his remarks.

There was no objection.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I thoroughly enjoyed the address and have no objection to the gentleman's proceeding further, except in the matter of fairness to other Members who want to speak.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentlewoman from Indiana [Mrs. JENCKES].

Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, at this time I wish to address the House of Representatives relative to a subject which appears to me as one which should receive the consideration of all Americans, especially every Member of Congress. As my address will be very short, I do not wish to yield any of my time, and I hope I will not be interrupted until I have concluded. I wish to talk to you about our native American citizens, the Indians. Regrettably there are no Indians in my State of Indiana, but my interest in these first Americans is deep and sincere and goes back to stories of my childhood days that were told by my parents about my paternal ancestor, Judge Henry Vander Burg, who was one of the first Federal judges in that great Northwest country where live so many of these virile people.

It is a recognized fact that great injustices have been perpetrated upon these people. History has distorted facts in many instances until today the word "Indian" calls up in the minds of most people a whooping, yelling savage. Few people stop to consider that the Indians received the Pilgrim Fathers and helped them through that first cold, hard winter; that the friendly relationship then existing between these two noble races was symbolized in the first Thanksgiving in America.

People overlook the fact that the Indian gave all that he had to give, his food, his land, even his form of government; that he played a vast and heroic part in the establishment of our American ideals of democracy; and that it was only when he saw the incoming hordes pushing him ever westward that he rebelled and fought—fought for his homeland and his very existence as a race.

Certainly, it would seem, that for all these people have contributed to our national well-being, they should be given just consideration. I had been led to believe that conditions were improving for the Indians. Although I had never had the pleasure of knowing many of them personally, those whom I knew were intelligent Americans comparing most favorably with all other of our citizens.

Recently some astonishing facts have been called to my attention by the Indians themselves.

I am amazed to learn that in this year, 1935, the Indians as a race, are kept separate and apart from other citizens and are still continued in the status of incompetent wards; that their person and their property is subject to the control of a bureau to which Congress has delegated the power of guardianship; that notwithstanding the fact that all Indians were declared citizens by special act of the Congress in 1924, that previous to that time many of them had always had the right of citizenship, through the enabling act which made Oklahoma a State in the case of Oklahoma Indians and by the ancient Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo made with Mexico in the case of all the Indians of the Southwest; notwithstanding all of this, that today many of them are denied the privilege of exercising their rights as voting citizens of America, and that many more of them are continued under the dual role of wards and citizens; that in many of these cases, although they exercise their rights as voting citizens in all elections, and although they have sufficient funds and resources to maintain all their own affairs, they are yet held powerless to have one word to say about the expenditure of their money or the employment of the people who manage or mismanage their affairs.

Does it seem possible that today in this great country, which has always been the haven of hope for all oppressed people, that our own native citizens are held in the bonds of slavery? That this race of proud, free people has been reduced through oppression to a state of serfdom and helplessness, in many instances, and are denied their God-given birthright to progress as a free people in this land of freedom? Can this be true of free America?

And just how are the affairs of the Indians being administered by this Bureau of Indian Affairs? I have been making inquiries about this matter. From February 11 up to and including April 19 of this year, in this Congress the Indians themselves are complaining bitterly before a subcommittee of the House Indian Committee, our worthy colleague, Hon. ABE MURDOCK, chairman, against the methods being pursued today.

These Indians, who are sincerely concerned about the future of their race, requested these hearings and have presented the evidence before this subcommittee of the House Indian Committee. They have alleged that the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in the conduct of his office, is guilty of maladministration, misuse of public funds, sedition, and communism.

If the things revealed before this subcommittee be true, then they should become the concern of every patriotic American who is interested in the maintenance of our American ideals of democracy.

For instance: The Indians alleged that the Wheeler-Howard Act which the present Commissioner propagandized through the last Congress under the guise of bestowing self-government upon the Indian citizenship of the United States not only does not grant them self-government but that it goes farther toward entrenching Bureau control of their affairs than any previous legislation of Congress; that in the face of the Citizenship Act of 1924 this bill is unconstitutional; they further allege that it had its origin and was sponsored as early as 1932 by the American Civil Liberties Union, whose headquarters are located in New York City.

Their contention is that this organization is one of the most active communistic organizations in the United States and that all legislation flowing from that source is decidedly communistic. The Indians further contend that the Wheeler-Howard Act is being administered largely through Indian Bureau and Interior Department officials, now or formerly identified with the American Civil Liberties Union. They point out the fact that a former State secretary of this organization, testifying before the subcommittee, has stated that the Democratic Party has taken over the full legislative program of the Civil Liberties Union in his State; and the further fact that Commissioner Collier has expressed great and sincere admiration for Roger Baldwin, one of its leaders who was imprisoned for draft dodging during the war and who has testified before a congressional committee that the American Civil Liberties Union upholds the right of a citizen or an alien to advocate force and violence, murder and assassination in the overthrow of government.

If these amazing things be true, then they become a matter of grave concern, not alone for the Indian but for the citizens of the Nation as a whole. Are we to allow this kind of administration of Indian affairs to continue in the face of the facts that the wealth of the Indians, which is under the complete control of this Federal bureau, amounts to more than a billion dollars and is located in some 22 States of our Nation; that this bureau has direct control of the life and conduct of some 340,000 of our native American citizens and that it regularly employs more than 5,000 people, and now, through the emergency relief work, thousands of others; that it spends annually between twenty and thirty millions of dollars of our taxpayers' money through direct appropriations from Congress and through allocation of relief funds has spent more than $44,000,000 additional money during the last year or so? Americans, I say to you, Shall we allow this to continue?

Fellow Members of the House, I ask you if you are aware of some of the other things that are being put into operation by the present Indian Bureau officials? The Indians tell me, that before this subcommittee it has been disclosed that Commissioner Collier spent some $1,500 taken from the educational funds appropriated by Congress for the education of Indians to bring Dr. Moises Saenz, a citizen of Old Mexico, here to this country to visit our Indian reservations and to tell us how to deal with our Indian citizens; that the Commissioner stated before the committee that he thoroughly approves of the Mexican school system and considers it almost the most perfect in the world. Americans, what is wrong with our own educational system that we cannot apply it to our native American citizens?

The Indians tell me further that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in his effort to secure passage of the Wheeler-Howard Act, went before Indian audiences and conducted a campaign of propaganda designed to arouse race prejudice and hatred; called former high officials of the Government liars and crooks; told the Indians that it had been the policy of the Government for many years to rob them; that he constantly advised them to take control of their own affairs and expressed the hope that the Mexican system of Indian government would prevail here; and held forth to our native American citizens the fallacy that they, too, should "recapture their lands" and take "over control of their government." If these things be true, it is greatly to the credit of the Indians that there has been no general uprising with loss of blood thus far.

And, incredible as it seems, the Indians tell me that the Commissioner, in pursuing his policy of further segregating the Indians and putting his alleged communistic schemes in effect, is spending public money, through P. W. A. allocation, to build a "Navajo world." They say that what he terms as the "Navajo capitol" is located in Arizona, just about 35 miles north of the city of Gallup, N. Mex.; that although it is not yet completed, some $950,000 has been spent; that around this "capitol" are located 47 "community centers", or day schools, costing approximately and conservatively estimated, about $1,000,000 for construction alone, to say nothing of a well for each center, the total cost of which is about $350,000 more of public money. The Navajo Indians themselves do not want this "capitol." They are complaining about it and the day schools. Yet the Commissioner spends more than $2,000,000 to further his own ideas and plans.

Of all the un-American ideas, this one of a separate racial capital in America, the melting pot of the world, would seem to be the worst, and our taxpayers are paying for this.

The Indians allege that here in these "community centers" the Commissioner, over the protest of the Navajo Indians, is putting into operation the Mexican school systems; that he has two women employed there organizing these "community centers"; that one of them has spent 10 years in Mexico studying the upheaval caused by the "social revolution" in that country, and that the other one has a distinctly Mexican background. The Indians say that they have no desire to become Mexicans or adopt Mexican ideas; that they wish to be Americans.

Perhaps the most astonishing thing that the Indians tell me about what has been revealed before this subcommittee is the fact that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has persuaded a man who was a native citizen of Turkey, and who had been in this country for close to 20 years, to take out his first citizenship papers so that he could be placed in charge of the Indian land program of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration. This man will have the control and direction of the vast amount of money which the Commissioner hopes will be expended to provide land for landless Indians, ultimately about $154,000,000, so he stated before the Appropriations Committee of this House. I was horrified to learn that such a thing could have taken place at this time, when thousands of our American citizens are without the means of providing for the bare necessities of life. Fellow Members of the House, the employment in a high governmental position of this man, who has never thought highly enough of our American Government and institutions to make an effort to become one of us until he was out of work, is an outrage and an injustice to every American.

My colleagues, these things are told to me by the Indians themselves—native American citizens, who are being denied the rights which we grant, for the mere asking, to all others who come to our shores. These Indians wish to continue to be Americans. They wish to help maintain the ideals of America established by Washington, preserved by Lincoln, and advocated by all patriotic Americans of all times. They recognize that the only way for the Indian to go is forward, step by step, and side by side with other Americans.

The marriage of John Rolf and Pocahontas, to my mind, has always symbolized the correct solution of the Indian problem, the dawn of America. The races of the Old World come to America and are swallowed up, lose their racial or national identity, and become what? Americans!

Shall we continue to deny to our native Americans this right? Shall we continue to spend the millions upon millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money furthering this un-American system of segregation which has been pursued in the past and which has been a stumbling block and a detriment to the Indians and to America?

None of us here today are responsible for the wrongs committed by our ancestors, but surely the responsibility for correcting these present wrongs which the Indians have called to our attention rests squarely upon the shoulders of every Member of this Congress.

My dear colleagues, these American Indians are appealing to us for help. Their appeal is reasonable. They only ask to be treated as Americans. With pardonable pride they point out that their race has always voluntarily answered the call to the colors in defense of this, their native country; that more than 12,000 of their number served in the recent World War. In the face of all that they tell us, can we afford, as Americans, as Members of the Congress, to deny them this help?

As just a little help to them in their furtherance of their efforts to be Americans I am introducing today a bill to grant a group of conscientious, intelligent, native American citizens a Federal charter of incorporation for an all-Indian organization.

Only a few organizations have been accorded this high honor. All of them have been real American organizations. As a matter of simple justice, I call upon every Member of this House of Representatives to support this legislation.

I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Did the gentlewoman vote for the Wheeler-Howard Act during the last session of Congress?

Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana. I am not sure whether I did or not.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I am quite sure that the gentlewoman from Indiana did not at that time protest against this act. Everything she is complaining about now with reference to the Indian Commissioner has to do with his trying to carry out the provisions of that act.

Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana. The Indians themselves were misled as to the effect of the legislation. I prefaced my remarks by saying that my contact with the Indians this year has developed more than any time before, and I have had honorable, upright Indians tell me this story. I have quoted their story in my address today.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Is it the gentlewoman's understanding that each tribe must vote to come within the purview of the Wheeler-Howard Act?

Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana. Yes; that is true, but they are not given the opportunity to vote. The thing that the Indians have brought to me by way of complaint is that they are not given the opportunity to express their own wishes in the matter. For instance, take the Navajo settlement. That is just being pushed on them.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I happen to be a member of the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee having to do with the Interior Department bill, and this whole matter was gone into. If the gentlewoman will read the hearings and the testimony of Mr. Collier and the others on this subject she will be enlightened.

Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana. Does the gentleman mean the testimony given before the Indian Affairs Committee this year?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. No. It was not the Indian Affairs Committee. I refer to the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee having to do with the Interior Department appropriation bill.

Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana. Last year's appropriation bill?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. No; this year—1936.

Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana. The information I have gathered is from the committee hearings before a subcommittee of the Indian Affairs Committee.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Yes; but if the gentlewoman will look at the hearings had by the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations I think she will be enlightened.

Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana. I will refer to those hearings. [Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Young].

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak briefly in regard particularly to the inferior Federal judiciary of our country. Before doing this, let me voice my protest against the power now exercised by the Supreme Court of the United States in setting aside by a mere majority vote and declaring unconstitutional, by a vote of 5 to 4, laws passed by the representatives of the people in the Congress of the United States and approved by the Chief Executive elected by the people. I personally favor enactment of a law providing that no law may be declared unconstitutional by a Supreme Court except by a decision of at least three-fourths of the judges thereof. In other words, by a 7-to-2 decision as the Court is now constituted. No constitutional amendment is necessary to provide this. All that is necessary is for the Congress to exercise powers rightfully belonging to it by passing a law directing that at least three-fourths of the judges of the Supreme Court must concur in declaring any act of Congress unconstitutional, otherwise such act of Congress shall continue as the law of the land. Section III of the Constitution declares as follows in referring to the powers of the Supreme Court:

In all other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

Now, I pass on from this august tribunal, which is law-maker, court of last resort, and executioner combined in one, to matters pertaining to the inferior Federal courts of our country, over which the Congress has and should exercise direct and complete power and control.

Impeachment, particularly as applied to the Federal judiciary, is an expensive, unwieldy, and well-nigh impossible process. The congressional committee investigating three United States district judges of Illinois listened to testimony of a shocking character. It is my well-considered opinion, after studying the report and the hearings of charges involving United States District Judge Charles A. Woodward, James H. Wilkerson, and Walter C. Lindley, that these three Federal judges were guilty of offenses involving moral turpitude and have shown themselves utterly unfit to occupy the high judicial positions to which they were intrusted. It is unfortunate that impeachment proceedings were not brought against them. Recently the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] made charges on the floor of the House against United States Circuit Judge Alschuler. I listened to the charges he made. I know nothing of the facts. I therefore express no opinion. My purpose in taking the floor is to deny the statement frequently made that United States judges are appointed for life. The facts are that the Constitution of the United States provides that Federal judges "shall hold their offices during good behavior." If the makers of the Constitution had intended this to mean life tenure, they would have so written. It is my judgment that instead of resorting to the unwieldy and almost impossible process of impeachment proceedings by the House of Representatives and trial before the United States Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, the Congress should define good behavior as it relates to the Federal judiciary. Then a tribunal should be provided to hear charges brought against any Federal judge that his judicial conduct does not constitute good behavior, and if and when such charges are sustained this tribunal should have the power and authority to order the removal of such Federal judge or provide such other punishment as is fitting.

The inferior Federal judges of this country are, as a class, arrogant, domineering, and tyrannical.

In the conduct of trials, United States district judges too frequently usurp the functions of juries and conduct trials in a high-handed and arbitrary manner.

Federal judges too frequently have become, not a group of public servants but a group of public dictators and tyrants and without responsibility to anyone. Federal judges were not meant to be lawmakers, judges, and executioners all in one, and without responsibility to the people of the country. Usurpation of dictatorship of the Federal courts of our land will perhaps only be checked, either by appointment or election, of Federal judges for a limited time, say, 6 years, instead of appointment during good behavior.

Tyrannical and arbitrary conduct on the part of Federal courts in this country is not a product of recent years. The Democratic national platform in 1896 stated:

We denounce arbitrary interference by Federal authorities in local affairs as a violation of the Constitution of the United States and a crime against free institutions, and we especially object to government by injunction as a new and highly dangerous form of oppression by which Federal judges, in contempt of the laws of the States and rights of citizens, become at once legislators, judges, and executioners.

The present Chief Justice of the United States, Justice Hughes, a few years ago, criticized the late Federal Judge Lowell, of Massachusetts, for language of the Federal judge in his instructions to a jury. Judge Lowell, in his charge to this jury, said:

And now I am going to tell you what I think of the defendant's testimony. You have noticed, Mr. Foreman and gentlemen, that he wiped his hands during his testimony. It is a rather curious thing, but that is almost always an indication of lying. Why it should be so we don't know, but that is a fact. I think that every single word that man said, except when he agreed with the Government's testimony, was a lie.

Misconduct of this sort by a Federal judge makes a travesty of trial by jury.

The Constitution of the United States, article III, provides:

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which will not be diminished during their continuance in office.

There is apparently no authoritative judicial construction of the meaning of the expression "during good behavior", as used in the Constitution, article III, section 1, defining the tenure of judges of the "supreme and inferior courts." Two cases cited on the point stop short of real definition:

(1) Kentucky, etc., Bridge Co. v. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. (37 Fed. 567). Here one question was whether the Interstate Commerce Commission was an "inferior court"; and the court, noting the fact that the Commissioners were appointed for fixed terms said that even if the Commission were such a court, the individual members were not judges holding during good behavior, to whom the judicial power of the Government could constitutionally be intrusted.

(2) Howard v. United States, (22 Ct. of Claims, 316). The real question was whether the territorial courts were inferior courts of the United States; and having decided that they were not, it followed that a judge of such a court was not a judge protected by the good behavior clause, but a civil officer subject to removal, etc.

A great many people seem to believe that, like Moses on Mount Horeb, they are treading on holy ground if they consider making judges accountable to the people. I honor the judiciary. My father served for many years as a trial judge in Ohio.

The Temple of Delphi was scarcely more sacred to the ancient Greeks than is the Federal judiciary to many of our fellow citizens. I respect and admire just and honorable judges. Nevertheless, the Federal judiciary is not sacrosanct. Thomas Jefferson wrote: "Judges are as honest as other men, and not more so." Jefferson also wrote: "Whenever a free people should give up in absolute submission to any department of the government, retaining for themselves no appeal from it, their liberties are gone." I lay down this doctrine, no matter how good a judge is, no matter how learned a judge is, he is not capable enough to be entitled to retain his office if the majority of the people do not want him as a judge and have lost confidence in him.

The Federal judges of our country with notable exceptions have, as a rule, usurped powers and functions and too frequently have made a mockery of trial by jury. This right of trial by jury is one of the most sacred rights known to our laws. It has long been regarded a bulwark of our liberties. The Declaration of Independence, for one thing, indicted the English Crown for denying us, in many instances, the right of trial by jury.

If it be true, as Blackstone suggests, in his Commentaries on the Law of England, that Greece and Rome declined and disappeared as great nations because they knew not of the right of trial by jury, let it not be said that we destroyed ourselves as a great nation because we threw away this right.

Congress should repeal retirement pay for Federal judges. Federal judges should not be considered a privileged class. In fact, it would be well to abolish altogether all the inferior Federal courts. Twenty Federal judges have retired on full pay and are receiving $222,500 per annum. These judges had a lifetime job. It is too much of a good thing to require the public to support them now they are retired. There appears no more justification for retiring a Federal judge on full pay than there is for retiring many other public officials and employees who have contributed industry, intelligence, and loyalty in the public service. It is termed retirement pay. It is, in fact, a pension.

I have introduced in this Congress a bill to abolish the retirement pay of all Federal judges. It is H. R. No. 5616. It is my hope that the Judiciary Committee will vote out this bill and that it will become a law.

Those retired United States judges still "feeding at the public trough" as recipients of pensions are as follows:

United States circuit judges:
Albert B. Anderson.....	$12,500
George W. Anderson.....	12,500
Wilbur F. Booth.....	12,500
Arthur C. Denison.....	12,500
William H. Hunt.....	12,500
George T. Page.....	12,500
A. S. Van Valkenburgh.....	12,500
R. W. Walker.....	12,500
United States district judges:
C. F. Amidon.....	10,000
George M. Bourquin.....	10,000
John R. Hazel.....	10,000
John M. Killitts.....	10,000
Jeremiah Neterer.....	10,000
Duval West.....	10,000
Robert T. Ervin.....	10,000
John E. Sater.....	7,500
United States Court of Claims:
Edward K. Campbell.....	12,500
Samuel J. Graham.....	12,500
United States Customs Court, Israel F. Fischer.....	10,000
Supreme Court, District of Columbia, Wendell P. Stafford.....	10,000

One of these, United States District Judge John M. Killitts, of Toledo, tried to go through bankruptcy. He is indebted to the liquidator of a defunct Toledo bank for more than $100,000. Thousands of Toledo school children placed their savings in this bank. Ex-Judge Killitts obtained $105,000 of this money upon his unsecured note. The bank failed. The school children lost their savings. The judge never repaid the $105,000. He kept his "swag." He still draws $10,000 each year as a retired United States judge. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I agree with the gentleman with reference to the abolishment of retirement pay, but the gentleman should come down to my district in west Texas and try a case down there in the Federal court. I would rather try a case down there in the Federal court than in the State court. You can get a quicker action and you can get just as fair a trial as anywhere in the world. It is only a question of who is appointed on the bench.

Mr. YOUNG. I may say to the gentleman from Texas that we have some very high-class Federal judges in Ohio also whose ability and integrity cannot be questioned.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Alaska such time as he may desire.

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein brief excerpts from a letter as reported in the press yesterday written by Hon. Cyrenus Cole, of Cedar Rapids, to the Secretary of Agriculture and also brief excerpts from some Government bulletins published under the supervision of the Department of Agriculture concerning farming in Alaska, and particularly in the Matanuska Valley regions.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alaska?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, yesterday my attention was called to references in the press with respect to a letter written by Hon. Cyrenus Cole, of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, former Member of the House of Representatives, to the Secretary of Agriculture, in which he denounced the homestead settlement project now being set up in the Matanuska Valley, Alaska, and referred to the settlers as "subsidized and deluded trekkers" and "victims of professorial dreamers." The only reason I feel impelled to refer to this letter is on account of the reputation and standing of Mr. Cole, since he formerly served in the House of Representatives, and on account of the great number of misstatements of fact embraced in his letter.

As a preliminary, it may be well to say that the Government, through the F. E. R. A., is now aiding in the settlement of 200 families, embracing approximately 1,000 persons, in the Matanuska Valley, which is situated in the southern part of the main body of Alaska about 36 miles north of the city of Anchorage and 150 miles from the seaboard terminus of the Alaska Railroad at Seward, Alaska. These families, I am informed, have been chosen from the States of Wisconsin, Michigan, and Minnesota. They were all, when so chosen, on relief, or entitled to relief, and so it was the duty of the Government in any event to take care of them in some fashion.

The individuals embraced in these families are reported to be sober and industrious people and that their present plight is the result not of anything they did or failed to do, but of the adverse circumstances which have overwhelmed so many excellent people in recent years. The plan of settlement has been well thought out, and in detail, by the administration. The project is not being entered into in a haphazard manner or without thought. Surely if these people are to be helped at all it is much better to help them get in a position to hereafter help themselves, even though the initial cost may be a little greater. In the long run there will be a saving of Government funds, a saving of human effort, and the saving of the self-respect of these citizens of the United States.

Mr. Cole is quoted as saying in his letter addressed to Hon. Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, in part, as follows:

I have been shocked by the glaring publicity that writers paid for by the Government have been giving to what is styled the "migration to Alaska." At Government expense a thousand men, women, and children are now on their way to the northland—and how many more are to follow them?

In 1923 your father, Henry C. Wallace, and I made tours of Alaska; he as a member of the Harding party and I as a member of a congressional investigating committee. We both looked at the country through Iowa-born agricultural eyes. He may have been more favorably impressed than I was, but I recall that he said to me one time, "Sometime, now far away, when our lands have become exhausted we may have to go up there to coax food from the soil, but I hope I will never have to go there to follow a plow with a mosquito net over my head."

The ghost writers of the Government, who may all have college educations, in word pictures and with ordinary pictures, are depicting the Matanuska Valley as another Garden of Eden. But the men who have such visions of milk and honey may never have seen that Alaskan valley as your father and I saw it in 1923.

May I recall some of the things we saw there? A thin soil hardly more than a foot of which is thawed out in summertime, with a thousand feet of frozen ground under it, for Alaska underneath still belongs to the glacial era of the world's history. On this soil all kinds of vegetation make a quick and prodigious growth while the sun beats on it for 20 or more hours each day. But these quick-growing products are seldom matured and retain too much moisture. An Iowa woman in Fairbanks told me they always get their winter potatoes from Seattle.

Moss grows everywhere. The reindeer does the best he can with it, but he cannot make beefsteaks out of nothing. It is not a grass country, and when hay is made the grass has to be cured on racks, for left on the ground to cure it would rot. But if grass is grown, as they say it can be, the mosquitoes will see to it that the cows do not give contented milk.

There is much more to the same effect, and little, if any, of it correct. The whole picture is grossly distorted. Some of the statement is to an Alaskan rather amusing, for Mr. Cole says that when he was in Alaska in 1923 he traveled through this region, and "out of one shack came a man and a woman who stared at us with the blankest and most hopeless eyes I have ever seen—eyes that haunt me still." This is quite poetical—and of course, I do not know to whom the author refers—but, in any event, I have lived in Alaska for more than 30 years and I have never seen the "blank, hopeless stare", as Mr. Cole describes it, in the eyes of any man or woman in Alaska. In fact, Alaskans generally are so hopeful and so optimistic that these sentiments amount to a positive virtue.

I am quite familiar with many portions of Alaska, including the Matanuska Valley. The area of the Territory is so great that I think no man living is familiar with all parts of it. Let us take up some of the items contained in Mr. Cole's statement.

He refers to the ghost writers of the Government who have painted such pleasing pictures of the Matanuska Valley as another Garden of Eden, and he says he has been shocked by the glaring publicity that writers paid for by the Government have been giving to what is styled the "migration to Alaska." This, as far as I have been able to find out, is all imagination or propaganda, and no ghost writer of the Government has given out any statements concerning Alaska except as based upon experience and upon official records of the various departments of the Government, kept over a series of years. It is true that newspapers all over the United States have shown a deep interest in this subject, and I suppose that I personally have talked with a dozen reporters and hundreds of other people concerning this colonization plan. In every case I have furnished facts as known to me and I am confident that the Government officials under whose supervision this plan has been brought into being have done the same thing. None of us has used any extravagant adjectives, and if any glowing words were embraced in newspaper articles or otherwise they were not supplied by any of us. We have tried to tell the truth about this matter as we knew it, and that is all there is to that.

Reference is made in this letter to "a thin soil hardly more than a foot of which is thawed out in summertime, with a thousand feet of frozen ground under it." This statement is entirely incorrect. There is not a word or a syllable or a letter of truth in it, except that soil exists in the Matanuska Valley. To the best of my knowledge, no permanently frozen ground can be found in the Matanuska Valley, although there is permanently frozen ground in the Tanana Valley, and in many other parts of Alaska. The soil of the Matanuska Valley is not thin but, on the contrary, it is deep and fertile. It may be that if one searched hard enough he could find a place in Matanuska Valley where the soil is thin, but generally the opposite is the case. I have seen pits dug more than 6 feet deep in the Matanuska Valley and still in the bottoms is rich black loam. Of course, in this valley, as elsewhere, the soil is not of uniform thickness but generally it is rich and fertile and deep. As I have said before, there is no permanent frost in the valley so far as I am aware and I have been unable to find any record of any.

The letter continues, "Moss grows everywhere. The reindeer does the best he can with it, but he cannot make beefsteaks out of nothing." It is quite true that in the wooded portions of the valley moss grows beneath the trees, but I distinctly recall that near my home in the State of New York was quite an extensive forest or woodland on the top of what is known as "Nose Hill", on the north side of the Mohawk River, in Montgomery County, and I distinctly remember as a boy finding on Nose Hill moss almost everywhere on the ground beneath the trees. So far as my experience goes, the same is true in all wooded portions of the country; one will find more or less moss in the forests. But, of course, when the trees are cut down and the stumps are pulled and the ground is cleared, the settler always burns the moss before he attempts to cultivate the land. That has been done on several thousand acres already in the Matanuska Valley, and the fact that moss originally covered the soil where the primeval forest still grows upon it does not make the soil any less fertile. This moss seems to be dragged in as a sort of bugaboo in order to scare people, or to make the project seem impossible of success.

Reference is also made to looking "at the country through Iowa-born agricultural eyes", and finding it impossible. Well, the same thing used to be said of Iowa and North and South Dakota and Colorado and Kansas and Nebraska and Oregon, and, in fact, the entire part of the country west of the Mississippi by some people of the East. The western region was declared by many people to be incapable of habitation, to be worthless and useless, and the persons so condemning all of the western country spoke with the wisdom of men who had never left the Atlantic seaboard. Such statements make me wonder sometimes whether the pioneer spirit which made America grow has entirely departed from our people. When men look at any part of the country through any peculiar or local or parochial or sectional "eyes", then it is apparent that those men have lost entirely the spirit of adventure or they are wholly incapable of seeing new lands in their true aspect.

Before we proceed further let us see from official record what Alaska, and particularly the Matanuska Valley, really is. I have here copy of a bulletin entitled "Information for Prospective Settlers in Alaska", issued October 15, 1923, revised October 15, 1930. This bulletin is also known as "Circular No. 1 of the Agricultural Experiment Stations in Alaska", prepared under the supervision of the United States Department of Agriculture. It is authoritative and authentic, in fact, to my mind, it is ultraconservative. No extravagant hope or promise is here held out to the settlers of Alaska. If anything, the good features of the country are minimized and special stress has been placed upon its difficulties. This circular tells us the following:

Most of Alaska lies between the same parallels of latitude as Norway, Sweden, Finland, and one-third of Russia, which have a population of over 10,000,000. Alaska embraces about 570,000 square miles of territory. It has been demonstrated both at the Government experiment stations and by hundreds of settlers scattered over the country that the Territory has agricultural capabilities of considerable range. Information as to this can be obtained in the annual reports of the Alaska agricultural experiment stations. In recent years considerable publicity has been given to the agricultural possibilities of the Matanuska and the Tanana Valleys. These regions have fertile soil and are well suited to the production of certain kinds of foodstuffs. The Government railway traverses both valleys and has made them accessible to settlers. Other areas, less favorably located, can be brought under cultivation with comparative ease.

Further on page 2 we have a table of annual precipitation and mean and extremes of temperature at various places in the coastal region of Alaska. We find by reference to this table, for example, that the annual average precipitation at Ketchikan, Alaska, over a period of years has been 157.97 inches, very heavy. But at Cordova it has averaged 144.79 inches; that 80 miles away at Valdez it has been 52.73 inches; while at Anchorage, which is within 36 miles of the Matanuska Valley, the average annual precipitation over a period of 13 years has been 14.80 inches. We find further on from this circular and from other official records that the average annual precipitation in the Matanuska Valley over a period of years has been about 14 inches. On pages 4 and 5 of the circular we find the following with respect to the interior of Alaska:

In the interior, on the other hand, the growth of native trees and shrubs is not so luxuriant, but more nearly approaches that of normal crops of grass and grain in the States. While the fall rains interfere with the curing of the crops, there is generally sufficient dry weather to harvest them without much loss.

The summers are sometimes uncomfortably warm in the interior; the temperature at Rampart has occasionally reached 96° F., but these hot spells are also of short duration.

Alaska is estimated to contain approximately 65,000 square miles of good land which can be made available for agriculture. The principal productive areas are found in the Matanuska Valley, the Tanana Valley, the Kuskokwim Valley, and the Yukon Valley. There is another considerable body of agricultural land north of the Tanana River, between the Tanana and Fortymile, and more particularly along the South Fork of the Fortymile River. It has been estimated to contain 750,000 acres. This will probably prove to be one of the most productive regions of Alaska when developed. This large area has as yet no transportation facilities worthy the name. The Bates Rapids in the Tanana River, some distance beyond Fairbanks, are of such a nature that only small and very powerful boats can pass them, and due chiefly to this cause there are very few boats that pass to the upper Tanana.

Further on, beginning on page 6 of the circular, there is quite an extensive statement with respect to the Matanuska Valley. We find in this reference to the character of the soil, to crops and drainage, and to various other matters, a part of which only I will read:

The good agricultural lands, such as the benches, hillocks, and ridges, are largely occupied by the Knik loam soils, which mostly have well-established drainage, even in localities far removed from streams. All these soils are gravelly in the substratum, and for this reason possess as nearly perfect internal and downward drainage as is possible.

Ditching is not necessary, except when it is desired to give an outlet to the lower depressions. The deeper loams, such as the typical Knik loam, hold sufficient moisture, especially with proper soil management, to meet the requirements of all crops in ordinary seasons. It is estimated that 75 percent of the more valuable farming land of this region is well drained and capable of conserving ample moisture for crop needs.

Good water for domestic use is obtainable on all farms. Some farmers obtain their water from creeks and others have to dig wells ranging from 15 to 60 feet deep.

CROPS

Cereal crops, such as spring wheat, oats, and barley, grow well in the Matanuska Valley. The yields per acre for the past 6 years have been 22 bushels for wheat, 51 bushels for oats, and 24 bushels for barley. Potatoes yield more than 200 bushels per acre on good soil. The usual time for seeding cereal grains is about May 15, and the harvesting time is about September 1. Growth during the period soon after seeding is usually comparatively slow, owing to the dry weather. The moisture in the ground resulting from the melting snow is sufficient to germinate seed, and light showers later cause a rapid plant growth.

Spring wheats of the earliest types can be matured. Difficulty is sometimes experienced in curing the shocks in the field, owing to the moist fall climate. There is little demand at present for spring wheat in the immediate neighborhood, but as soon as a sufficient quantity can be grown it will likely be shipped to Fairbanks for milling.

Barley has proved to be valuable as a grain feed. It grows well in all the upland soils, and can be used as a forage and as a grain crop. As a grain crop it takes the place of corn for fattening hogs and cattle.

Winter rye can be grown successfully. It is sown the latter part of July and matures in August of the following year, occupying the field for two seasons.

Root crops like mangels, carrots, rutabagas, and sugar beets yield abundantly. These crops are used to supplement silage or to take the place of silage where the farmer is not equipped with a silo.

Peas for canning yield heavily. As soon as a cannery is established, this crop will undoubtedly be grown extensively, since climatic conditions apparently are especially favorable for its growth.

The most important legumes grown by the farmers in the Matanuska Valley are field peas and annual vetches. Perennial legumes are not very successful, since they are heaved out of light soil by frost in winter.

LIVESTOCK

Successful farmers are centering their operations around dairying. A hardy breed of dairy cattle has been produced for the region by crossing the Holstein with a hardy strain of Galloway cattle. One of the cross-bred animals produced more than 12,000 pounds of milk during one lactation period. In addition to being hardy, these cattle are good rustlers and are easily kept in good condition.

It will be observed that wheat, oats, barley, rye, and most of the ordinary vegetables can be well grown and be matured. Reference is made in this statement to the yield of oats at 51 bushels per acre. This is very modest indeed, because we find by reference to the report of the agricultural experiment stations for the year 1926 that the yield of the best varieties of oats to the acre were as follows: Swedish Select, 87.5 bushels per acre; Leader, 85.5 bushels per acre; and Climax, 74.8 bushels per acre.

I wish to refer somewhat more at length to the 1926 report, for this was the last report made by Dr. C. C. Georgeson, for many years in charge of all of the agricultural experiment stations in Alaska. Dr. Georgeson, who has now been gathered to his fathers, had probably a greater and more comprehensive knowledge and vision of the agricultural possibilities of Alaska than any other man. He speaks in this report particularly with respect to the Matanuska Experiment Station in part as follows:

The summer of 1926 was typical of Matanuska. Spring began early. The last frost in spring occurred April 28, and the first killing frost in the fall, October 7, making a frost-free period of 182 days. Summer frosts, such as are peculiar to the northern tier of States and Canada, have not been found to occur at Matanuska in 9 years.

ARTICHOKES

White Jerusalem artichokes were seeded May 5 on a 1-acre plot. The stand was nearly perfect and the plants grew well. The tops attained a height of 6½ feet. Half of the crop was cut for silage. The yield was at the rate of 14.67 tons per acre. The other half of the crop was cured for forage, the tops being cut by hand and shocked like corn. The air-dried crop was at the rate of 3.8 tons per acre. Both sheep and horses relish artichoke forage and will leave oat hay for it.

A tenth-acre plat of artichokes planted in 1925 survived the winter with a protection of only a light covering of coarse manure. The tonnage of the tops indicated a yield of 16.8 tons per acre. The stalks grew vigorously and attained a height of 7 feet by August 10, when they were cut for silage.

MANGELS

The variety, heavy cropper, was planted May 19 on an acre plat. The crop grew vigorously and produced fair-sized roots which were smooth and stood well above the ground surface so that the mangels could easily be pulled by hand. The crop was harvested October 5 and 6 and yielded at the rate of 22.84 tons. Root crops are expensive to grow because they require much hand labor. Otherwise they might well be important as a source of feed for livestock in Alaska.

RUTABAGAS

Rutabagas which were grown on a 1-acre plat yielded 13.32 tons. The dry weather in early summer somewhat stunted growth.

TURNIPS

Petrowski turnips which were grown on 1½ acres of newly broken land yielded 14 tons.

CARROTS

Danvers half long was planted on a tenth-acre plat but made stunted growth until the rains increased. Carrots are especially good for horses.

One thing that contributes largely to the satisfactory results obtained by the real farmers and by the agricultural experiment stations in the Matanuska Valley and at other places in the main body of Alaska is the length of the sunlit days. At Fairbanks the longest day, June 21 of each year, gives sunlight for 21 hours 54 minutes; in the Matanuska Valley on June 21 sunlight is enjoyed for more than 20 hours. For a period of at least 6 weeks in the summer in all of that region of Alaska there is continuous daylight. The great number of hours of sunlight during midsummer, of course, contributes mightily to the growth of all crops and grasses. It is true that sometimes the harvest season is accompanied by cool weather and showers, which interfere with the curing of the hay and grains, but as stated in the official reports to which I have just referred, these conditions can be taken care of and happen only occasionally. Grain such as wheat and oats have been matured and threshed year after year. We find a reference to that in another bulletin put out by the Department of Agriculture showing that in 1920 the Matanuska Station threshed approximately 2,000 bushels of grain; that—in 1930 two local farmers, A. A. Shonbeck and John Buggs, purchased a threshing machine and began growing oats for grain. Results obtained at the station show that early varieties can be depended on to ripen in this region. A number of farmers in the Matanuska Valley are now growing oats for grain and for hay.

So far as the fertility of the soil and the climate are concerned, the settlement now being established in the Matanuska Valley has everything to recommend it. The same can be said of the care with which the plan of settlement has been worked out. There is one element upon which the success of the settlement depends which cannot be known definitely at this time, and that is the human element. If the settlers who are aided in locating in this valley are of the hardy, industrious, sober, and pioneer type, then the settlement is bound to succeed. I think they are of that type, because the administration has used care in their selection. But if they are not—if they are lazy or improvident or just helpless, that is to say, if they have not the initiative and the knack of doing work, and particularly of farming, then, of course, the outlook is not too bright. Altogether I think the administration is entitled to vast credit for undertaking a measure of this kind. It is endeavoring to make these people self-supporting. It is not intended that any of the agricultural products shall be exported to the United States. But there is an ample market right at hand in the cities and mining camps of Alaska for everything that can be produced by these settlers. Nor will other farmers, or anyone else, be injured by the setting up of this settlement, because these 200 families, embracing nearly a thousand people, if they succeed, as I am confident they will, will be able, through their success, to purchase other products from other parts of the United States; their purchasing power will be greatly augmented; and so, with their success the entire country is to that extent benefited.

I anticipate that these farmers will confine their efforts very largely to dairying and raising of cattle, sheep, and hogs for the local markets. That is indicated by the work at the Matanuska Experiment Station and by the work of other successful farmers in the Matanuska Valley.

Comment has been made upon the action of the Government in sending 300 C. C. C. workers to Alaska to aid in setting up this settlement. I had hoped and had urged that the unemployed of Alaska be put on this work. However, the F. E. R. A. officials in charge were convinced that substantial reasons existed in using the C. C. C. workers from the United States since no sufficient organization of such C. C. C. workers exists in Alaska and it was feared by the officials here that if the unemployed men of Alaska were used to aid in this settlement, there was danger they would all quit in the early summer if they were able to secure employment in the mines or in fishing, and that apprehension does not exist with respect to the C. C. C. workers sent in from the United States. Of course, I suppose that neither I nor any other one individual approves of every conceivable detail of this plan of settlement, but differences of opinion as to minor matters usually exist as to all other public and private plans and projects. Even in Congress no individual Member can have his own way all the time. Generally speaking, however, I approve definitely the plan. It is sound and statesmanlike, and I believe it will be successful; and, while like every other intelligent man I welcome criticism, I do wish that the critics would stick to the facts when they talk about it. Of course their conclusions are their own business, but the facts with relation to soil and climate and topography and agricultural experiments and markets and every other material factor involved in this settlement are shown by the official records and are available to all.

The letter, to which I have adverted to some length, illustrates what I said the other day on the floor of the House with reference to Alaska and to the fact that some men may travel through the Territory and when they leave it may not know any more about it than they did before they entered.

Reference has been made in this letter to a statement attributed to former Secretary Wallace under President Harding, the father of the present Secretary of Agriculture. I saw Secretary Wallace when he visited Alaska in 1923 and talked with him at length about the farming possibilities in the Territory. He certainly expressed to me no such sentiments as are attributed to him in the letter mentioned. [Applause.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Texas [Mr. McFARLANE] such time as he may desire.

CANDIDATE FISH ANSWERED ON COTTON EXPORTS AND PHILIPPINE TARIFFS ON TEXTILES—FACTS REGARDING COTTON EXPORTS

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time to answer some of the remarks which the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] made on the floor of the House this afternoon.

First, I call the attention of the Members of the House to the facts regarding cotton exports.

The Agriculture Department's 10-year average of the exportation of cotton from 1923 to 1934 and from 1932 to 1933 is 7,900,000 bales. Cotton exports 1933-34 was 7,534,000 bales. The real loss began in August 1934, running through March of this year, exports being 3,588,000 bales. The 10-year average through March 1935 is 6,344,000 bales. The above losses were suffered because of the high Republican tariff.

We would have lost the cotton exports back in the early 1920's if the Republicans had not entered into a policy of loaning the taxpayers' money to these foreigners so they could buy our cotton. We really have not lost our cotton exports, these foreign countries at the present time are playing a poker game, thinking that they can buy at a lower price. The exports have not been cut down 50 percent but only 40 percent as above shown, the consumption being cut down only 28 percent. They have been using up the stock purchased back in 1932 at low prices, on the 6-cent cotton furnished by the Republicans. Now the foreign countries think they can play a poker game, and have about used up their stock.

It seems to me that the gentleman from New York ought to get his figures straight before he comes on the floor to make a political speech further seeking nomination for the Presidency.

FACTS REGARDING PHILIPPINE TARIFF POLICY

I further want to call attention to a statement regarding the Philippine tariff situation. The gentleman from New York said that the State Department, through the Secretary of State—

Had turned thumbs down on the offer of the Philippine Congress to protect our own industry and our own taxable export trade with the Philippines.

He said further:

I do not know that you can use strong enough language. It comes nearer being a treasonable act to American wage earners and to American industry than anything I have known of in the 15 years I have been in Congress, and I defy anybody to show a single act of any administration that compares with it in any way at all—but this is the situation and these are the facts.

In answer to this outburst, I call your attention to a statement issued last fall by Secretary Hull. This is not a new question the gentleman is raising. I want to read from this statement issued recently by Hon. Cordell Hull, Secretary of State, regarding proposal for tariff increases in the Philippine Islands which were under consideration in the fall of 1934:

I believe you and your correspondent will welcome a fairly full statement of the situation in the Philippine Islands as it is understood in this Department. There was a move there for a general tariff revision providing for large increases in a great many items, increases ranging from 100 percent to more than 800 percent in the case of the textile schedules. But this bill, which had been drawn up by a committee in close cooperation with representatives of American exporters, was never introduced into the Philippine Legislature. Certain Filipino interests sponsored the bill frankly for the purpose of gaining support in the United States for the continuance of a special and preferred position for Philippine commodities in the American market. It is understood, however, that other interests did not favor it, basing their opposition particularly on the ground that it would increase the cost of living of Filipinos, especially those of the lower classes. Neither this Department nor any other department of this Government took any part in this controversy or sought to intervene in it.

There was only one way in which the opinion or point of view of this Government became a factor in the situation. Since tariff legislation in the Philippines requires the approval of the President before it can become law, the Governor General of the Philippine Islands followed the usual practice in such cases, requesting the War Department, and through it other agencies of this Government, to comment upon the proposed legislation.

In framing a response to this request, agencies of this Government were bound to keep in mind a number of considerations. As you know, the political relations of the Philippine Islands and the United States are in a period of transition and future trade relations between the two countries remain to be defined. At the time the proposed tariff revision was being considered a special committee of Congress was preparing to go to the Philippine Islands to discuss the economic problems involved in the existing Philippine independence legislation, and intensive studies of Philippine-American trade relations were about to be launched. Furthermore, this Government was giving serious consideration to trade relations with other countries which might be vitally affected by decisions concerning the trade relations of the Philippine Islands.

These and other considerations led this Department and other executive agencies of this Government to come independently to the same conclusion and as a result the War Department transmitted to the Governor General the considered judgment of these agencies that comprehensive tariff legislation in the Philippine Islands could best be considered after further study of all the factors involved and in connection with the development of an inclusive plan for the continued relations between the United States and the Philippine Islands.

You will note that this Department took no independent action and that in fact the joint action was limited to an expression of opinion.

As suggested above, the comment of agencies of this Government was only one of many factors in the situation. This comment in itself did not necessitate a change in the plans of the Filipino committee. The interplay of all factors, however, did lead the committee to drop the original bill, largely on the ground of lack of time to fully consider such a general and far-reaching revision of the tariff and to introduce in the Philippine Legislature a bill much restricted in scope and providing only for moderate increases in certain schedules of the tariff. This bill was never referred to this Government for comment, and it was not brought to a vote by the Philippine Legislature.

Finally, I wish to say that I consider it desirable to have an early definition of the future trade relations between the United States and the Philippines, and this Department is actively interested in the development of a constructive long-range plan for these relations. Progress has been made, and I believe that soon after the return of the congressional committee which has been visiting the Philippine Islands it will be possible to launch such a plan, with the consent of Congress and in agreement with the Philippine authorities. In the meantime, I should add, this Department has not offered objection to temporary measures designed to give protection or relief to the American textile trade in the Philippines during the period in which a general program is being worked out. You understand, of course, that action of this nature can be taken only by the Philippine Government itself.

Sincerely yours,

CORDELL HULL.

These are the facts in answer to the statements made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Fish] this afternoon.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BULWINKLE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 8021, the legislative appropriation bill, 1936, had come to no resolution thereon.

DAVID LEVINSON AND ROBERT MINOR

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on the Judiciary on House Resolution 219.

Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the facts sought by the resolution are incorporated in the committee's report, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I object to that.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold that while the Chair lays before the House a message from the President of the United States?

Mr. HEALEY. I withhold it, Mr. Speaker.

VETO MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—FRANK R. CARPENTER, ALIAS FRANK R. CARVIN (H. DOC. NO. 185)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following veto message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without my approval, House of Representatives bill no. 1565, entitled "An act for the relief of Frank R. Carpenter, alias Frank R. Carvin."

This bill provides that Frank R. Carpenter, alias Frank R. Carvin, shall hereafter be held to have received an honorable discharge from the military service on June 20, 1902, the purpose being to give him, as to the future, the rights, privileges, and benefits conferred by any law upon honorably discharged soldiers.

The Secretary of War advises that the official records of the War Department show that this ex-soldier, after serving one 3-year enlistment in the Army and being honorably discharged, reenlisted and, after serving a matter of 9 days, deserted the service; that no record has been found of the return of the soldier to his command, or of any report of his whereabouts or the cause of his absence having been made by him. Opposed to this there is only the soldier's statement, made in connection with his application for relief, that he has no recollection of reenlisting and must have done so while under the influence of liquor. Yet the official records show that he actually served some 9 days after reenlisting.

Enactment of H. R. 1565 into law would, in effect, constitute a legislative pardon for a man whose status is now that of a deserter and place him on a par with those who rendered services of a character which earned for them honorable discharges. I cannot subscribe to this.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 13, 1935.

The SPEAKER. The objections of the President will be spread at large upon the Journal.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill and the veto message be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered printed.

The motion was agreed to.

FARM CREDIT ACT, 1935

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 1384) to amend the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, to amend the Federal Farm Loan Act, to amend the Agricultural Marketing Act, to amend the Farm Credit Act of 1933, and for other purposes, with a House amendment, insist upon the House amendment and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. JONES, FULMER, DOXEY, HOPE, and KINZER.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. R. 3808. An act concerning the incorporated town of Seward, Territory of Alaska; and

H. R. 6718. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture and for the Farm Credit Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes.

BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on this day present to the President, for his approval, bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 3808. An act concerning the incorporated town of Seward, Territory of Alaska;

H. R. 6718. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture and for the Farm Credit Administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes; and

H. J. Res. 254. Joint resolution providing for an investigation by the United States Public Health Service of the plumbing and sanitary systems in Federal Government buildings.

THE WORK-RELIEF PROGRAM

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a speech delivered by myself recently before the first Regional Institute on Government at Albany, N. Y.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered at the First District Regional Institute on Government, Women's Division, Democratic National Committee, at Albany, N. Y., May 8, 1935:

I feel that I am extremely fortunate in being a party to this splendid gathering of women who are representative of democracy in three of our great Eastern States. You may be assured that I was genuinely happy to receive the kind invitation to address you and feel that I had been singularly honored.

The life of a Member of Congress, contrary to the aspect portrayed by some of our humorists, is not exactly that of the well-known Mr. Riley. The average Member, during a session, works from early morning until nightfall and in some instances later than that. Those of us who may be classed as seasoned veterans, who have served several terms and know the hazards of assuming obligations that will overtax our strength, endeavor to restrict speaking engagements to only the most important. I place this occasion in the latter category because of the regard I have for our Molly Dawson, and because of her great work in the cause of democracy. All of us who know her inspiring work, I am sure, are just as impressed with her qualities of leadership and courage as I am. Without her vision and direction this and similar meetings all over the country would not be. She has worked tirelessly and well for the women of the country, and is more than deserving of the help and inspiration you can give her by your interest.

All of you present here this afternoon represent divisions and subdivisions of a great political party, the dominant political party of the Nation. The political party that is making a colossal effort to free the Nation from the merciless yoke of economic distress that prior to March 4 threatened to work its destruction. You who are gathered here are the generals, the colonels, the majors, the captains, and the lieutenants of the vast army that has been mobilized by our great President to drive from the Nation's borders the invading forces of economic depression. Ultimate success, final victory, just as surely depend upon your intelligent grasp of national problems, upon your unselfish devotion to the great cause, as does that of the officer who leads an army into battle.

Recently our President, who is the Commander in Chief of this campaign against depression, mapped out and placed into effect plans for a strenuous drive against the enemy—a drive that should sever the yoke for all time. A plan to spend $4,000,000,000 on work relief, which is an investment in human life and character. It will be spent, of course, for many material projects, but the result will be to preserve the morale of our people in these last stages toward what we all hope and expect will be economic recovery. I refer to the much publicized $5,000,000,000 work-relief plan. The amount involved actually totals $4,880,000,000, but the five billion figure is that most generally used in reference to the law.

Now a program of this character, involving, as it does, the expenditure of a large sum of money, as well as ramifications of immense proportions, is certain to be difficult of comprehension to some citizens, and particularly to those not directly affected by its benefits. And then our Republican friends still waiting, like Mr. Micawber, for "something to turn up" in the form of campaign fodder can be relied upon to raise the cry of "stop spending"—a cry that was voiced by the head of the United States Chamber of Commerce only a week or so ago and still remains about the only stock in trade of Republican spellbinders who perceive party prestige fading away to the vanishing point.

Upon you and others in similar positions throughout the Nation rests the responsibility of presenting the work-relief plan in its true light. With you reposes the duty of acquiring an intelligent grasp of its various benefits, of charting its progress in your particular area, and of equipping yourself with data necessary to defend it against unjust and biased attack from selfish political interests.

Briefly, the new law is designed to give employment to those in want and so furnish a psychological need that the dole could not meet and at the same time to produce material results either in engineering construction or white-collar work. These measures are of two kinds. President Roosevelt, in his last speech, said, "The first is to make provisions intended to relieve, to minimize, and to prevent future unemployment. The second is to establish the practical means to help those of us who are unemployed in this present emergency. . . . This is a great national crusade to destroy enforced idleness which is an enemy of the human spirit generated by this depression." It makes available the sum of $4,000,000,000 for "made" work and eight hundred and eighty million for completion of direct-relief activities. It is estimated that it will furnish work to 3,500,000 idle, and assist materially in our already unmistakable march toward recovery. Its various projects probably will reach the peak of activity in November of this year. In other words the project will be going full blast by that date. It is important to note also that disbursements for the most part will be made as loans rather than as grants.

And in answer to "doubting Thomases" who have assailed loans made through the R. F. C. and to farmers it is appropriate to note the fact that 2,000 farmers paid their loans in full during the month of February; that 83 percent of the same class met their interest payments on land-bank loans; and that 53 percent of the loans extended by the R. F. C. have been repaid. I mention these facts to illustrate the fallacy of assertions that money loaned by Government for projects that supply jobs is "thrown away." Any of you who were depression sufferers and who were not, any of you who may have known the horror of unemployment or of want, know well that money expended to alleviate human misery is not money "thrown away." I think that women should be particularly interested in the President's determination to eliminate enforced idleness, because, as he says, it is "an enemy of the human spirit." I assume that many of you have been in close contact in the last 5 years with individuals and families who have been wounded by the depression. You have seen fathers leave their homes in the morning to search for work, returning empty-handed that night to a cold and dreary house. You have seen mothers economizing and scraping and smiling through their tears to keep up their men's courage. You have seen children so bereft of food and clothing that they could not attend school and had no heart to play. In short, you have seen at close range that "enemy of the human spirit" insidiously undermining the real resources of a nation's courage, character, and hope. And when courage, character, and hope are gone, God help the Nation.

From this standpoint, the expenditure of $4,000,000,000 is more than a program to erect bridges, to build roads, to dam up streams, to save our forests, to rehabilitate our farms, and to reestablish business and industry on a sound basis. It is, as I said at the beginning, an investment in human life and character which will pay dividends long after those bridges and roads have crumbled. To some it may appear that $4,000,000,000 is a lot of money for any government to spend, but it is a comparatively small sum if it will conquer those enemies which have brought physical want and spiritual dejection into our midst. It is a crusade without cost.

The cry of "wild expenditures" was raised by our Republican friends at the last election. Many of their spellbinders went so far as to predict national bankruptcy. The answer to all of that, of course, is available from market reports in daily newspapers. Government bonds are above par and the Treasury Department has stated that despite the increase in public debt the Government is paying less interest on that indebtedness than it paid a year ago. And then, my friends, we have a war on our hands—a war with an uncompromising enemy—an enemy that gained a firm foothold during 12 years of Republican misrule. It takes money to win a war, colossal sums of money. Surely no patriotic citizen thought the large sums expended during the late European war were not justified, and no patriotic American citizen, with compassion for the sufferings of his fellow man will believe the expenditures of large sums of money to win the present war against the economic evils that assail us are not justified.

There is another aspect to this great program which should appeal to women. Almost since the founding of the Republic, America has grown in a haphazard sort of way. In the early days there was little need to husband our resources because what they needed was development. Then, for many years we recklessly partook of the material comforts which material progress gave to us. There was no thought or plan behind our social, economic, and industrial expansion. America was a large and comfortable but ramshackle house.

Within the last 5 years, however, that house has failed us, due partly to inherent weaknesses and partly to our own careless housekeeping. Only too vividly we have seen once fruitful soil blowing away before our eyes. We have seen slums in both city and rural districts become the breeding places of crime and disease. We have built railroads through streets where children play and we have permitted death traps to exist at rural crossings. By imprudent management we have allowed our farms to lose their fertility and the farmers their markets. We have neglected to conserve or utilize to their full capacity our forests, our rivers, and our soil. We have been lazy, careless, short-sighted. We have, like bad housekeepers, let our house run down. It needs renovating. It needs cleaning. It needs rebuilding if it is to remain the dwelling place of a happy people. This $4,000,000,000 program which the President has inspired is designed to furnish a social, economic, and material housecleaning that has been long overdue. To clean our house on that scale requires work—hard work. But I am sure, and I know the President is sure, that the American people have not lost their capacity or their willingness to work when there is work to do. There has been some criticism, largely political, of this administration's expenditures for relief. Some have said that we are creating a nation of mendicants and destroying the fiber of the American people. To my mind, this is one of the most senseless and most cruel charges which has ever been made against a nation in distress. That is what I call playing politics with human misery.

The President's plan is grounded upon the common-sense principle that in order to create jobs and thus relieve human misery certain definite work projects must be created. If private industry and private charity were not able to provide the basic needs of life, it was incumbent upon the Nation to step in. To my mind that is one of the duties of government. Our people, however, much prefer to work than to remain on relief rolls. The President's $4,000,000,000 program is meant to provide work rather than relief. And the people's response to this new choice has been immediate and wide-spread. It is complete refutation of those who suggest that the American people prefer a relief basket to a pay check. Wherever agencies for the employment of men and women in this work program have been set up, they have been crowded all day long with men and women, old and young, seeking the chance to work, which ought to be their right.

This program is no vague, hastily conceived project of economic theorists or dreamers as some would make you believe. Although the details of this great work giving employment have not been completed, the President has carefully thought out its fundamentals. Let me read to you the six principles which must govern every approved project:

1. All projects must be useful.
2. All projects must be of a kind that will permit a large proportion of expenditures to go into human wages.
3. Projects which promise ultimate return of a large part of the cost to the Federal Treasury will be emphasized.
4. Money allocated for each project shall be spent promptly and not held over until later years.
5. Projects must be the kind which will give work to the people now on relief rolls.
6. Projects will be allocated to committees or relief areas where the number of people on relief rolls show that they are most needed.

This plan places the money appropriated at the disposition of 50 bureaus and agencies of the Government, not to be expended at the will of these various bodies but only under supervision of an allotment board of 22 members, of which Secretary of the Interior Ickes is chairman. Men have been chosen with experience in this kind of work. They have nothing new to learn, because they have already met the problems which will confront them. With the exception of creating three new agencies, the President has assigned the work of construction to departments already in existence. This will save time and money and prevent duplication. In some instances it will simply mean an expansion of the work which a department already performs. Because of the administration's experience in sponsoring and directing work and work-relief projects in the past, it can combine efficiency and speed in getting under way. The President has said that he expects to put three and one-half million people back to work and that the peak of construction will be reached by November. Among the projects that will be launched under the plan are those for eliminating dangerous grade crossings, for rural electrification, for highways, irrigation, reforestation, soil and coast erosion prevention, flood control, housing, additional Conservation Corps quarters, and aid to white-collar and clerical workers.

In the President's insistence that work be provided in proportion to the need of the various districts, he has insured that it will be allocated where it shall do the most good. But there is one feature of reconstruction on this scale which is not generally understood. Spending of this sort cannot be done on a selfish, parochial, or political scale. The money spent for a dam in the West benefits the workers of the East as well as the inhabitants of the reclaimed areas in the vicinity of the project. You may not know it, but a great percentage of the money which built the Boulder Dam was spent for turbines and other electrical equipment manufactured within a few miles of Albany. A great deal of the material used beyond the Mississippi and even beyond the Rockies came from the Atlantic seaboard. Lumber to be used in erecting modern homes in our metropolitan slum areas was grown in the Northwest and processed by the lumbermen of the coast. The railroads which transport manufactured materials in this great movement provide jobs for people living in all sections of the country. In view of this interplay of economic forces, I can think of no way in which money can be more effectively spent for the good of all the people.

As students of government, you will undoubtedly want to know the details of the set-up for handling the largest peace-time expenditures which any nation has made in all history.

First, there is the Division of Applications and Information, which has been formed as a new division of the National Emergency Council. This division will act as a clearing house for projects presented to it by local and State and Federal officials and agencies and by civic organizations. No matter what the source of the suggestions may be, this division will first receive all plans calling for the expenditure of work-relief funds.

Every plan submitted will first be classified and checked. It will then be subjected to the most rigid scrutiny before determining its feasibility, its usefulness, and its service as an instrument of employment. Trained experts will investigate its legal, financial, and engineering phases. Once the project has been questioned from all these standpoints, it must then stand another test. It must be of such a nature that it can be fitted into the ultimate purpose of providing useful employment to people on relief. Mr. Frank Walker, who many of you undoubtedly know as an extremely capable business man, will have charge of this Division of Applications and Information. This Division, I may add, has already begun its work, although it was not created until April 23.

When Mr. Walker's division has studied the projects submitted to it, it will pass them on to the Works Allotment Division. On the basis of the studies already made and information which it will possess itself, the Works Allotment Division will then recommend the projects to the President for his approval. The Works Allotment Division is headed by Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior, and consists of a score of Cabinet members and officials who have been closely associated with problems of relief and recovery for the last 2 years.

In addition to these Government officials, there will be representatives of business, labor, agriculture, banks, and local interests. When Mr. Walker's group and Mr. Ickes' group have thoroughly examined each project presented to them, you can be certain that they will possess the qualifications which the President has set up. Even then, however, the President will pass upon all proposals for work relief and decide what shall be undertaken and what shall not. After he has approved a project it will then be transmitted to the particular Government agency under which it falls and that Department will undertake the work.

In order to distribute work on the basis of human needs, the President has created a specific division to handle this problem. It is called the "Works Progress Division" and it is headed by Harry L. Hopkins, whose accomplishments as the Administrator of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration you all know. To assist him he will have the United States Employment Service and the Procurement Officer of the Government, Rear Admiral C. J. Peoples. The Employment Service will supervise reemployment of people on work relief who desire to return to private employment or who are needed in private employment. Admiral Peoples will supervise the purchase of the vast store of materials which will be needed for this program.

The Works Progress Division will also supervise the projects in the field. It will determine the amounts of security payments which will be made for various parts of the country. It will check projects at all times and report on the progress which is being made. Its field chains will investigate prospects for additional work and make recommendations. It will try to insure that, wherever possible, people shall be put to work on projects located near their homes.

Not only will the many branches of industry mentioned above benefit by these expenditures but the benefits will be reflected in allied and dependent industries. And most important of all there will be work, plenty of work for those to whom the word "job" almost became a myth during the past 4 years. The needy will be placed in a status of self-reliance, will regain confidence that slipped away when they went on relief rolls. Homes throughout the land will be brighter and the road ahead will be a happier and more cheerful one than any time the dread depresssion fastened its tentacles about the economic structure of the Nation.

The work-relief plan is a tremendous project, a real drive forward toward the objective of national, economic security. It must have the whole-hearted support and cooperation of all of the people of the Nation. You women gathered here are among those who must lead the legions that can attain to its objectives. You must acquaint yourselves with all of its ramifications; you must fight for it; you must instill in those to whom you are responsible the spirit necessary to make the fight. The President has asked you to help. You must not fail him, because this is your job as well as his—in a sense it is more yours because of your proximity to the problem.

We are going to win this fight. We're on the way up now but it remains for you to pass on all the information you have to those less fortunate than you who do not realize the great and practical and comprehensive program instituted to help us all. Pledge your support to the President now. Promise to help him. Give him your interest and your time; tell your neighbors of this plan and tell them to keep their courage and their faith in the greatest country in the world. We have a great leader, one who is interested in us and who holds our wants and needs close to his heart. Franklin Delano Roosevelt will continue to lead us out of the wilderness of despair into which we have fallen if we do our part. Cooperate with him, trust him, and sustain his plan to give to the people of this great country a new deal of security and justice.

DAVID LEVINSON AND ROBERT MINOR

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report (Rept. No. 906) on the resolution (H. Res. 219) and move to lay the resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution. The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 219

Resolved, That the Attorney General of the United States is hereby directed to transmit to the House of Representatives at the earliest practicable moment the following information, viz:

First. Copies of all official information on file in the Department of Justice or in possession of its agents concerning the kidnapping of David Levinson and Robert Minor in Plaza Center of Gallup, N. Mex., on May 2, 1935.

Second. Whether any person or persons have been apprehended or taken in custody with the crime of kidnaping said David Levinson and Robert Minor; and if not, whether the Department of Justice has instituted and prosecuted an investigation of said kidnaping with a view to bringing to justice those guilty of the crime of violating the act forbidding the transportation of kidnaped persons in interstate commerce, or to any Territory of the United States, approved June 22, 1932 (U. S. C., ch. 271, title 18, sec. 408a), as amended by the act of May 18, 1934 (Public, No. 232, 73d Cong.).

Third. Name or names of any and all persons questioned in connection with said investigation and statements made by them.

Fourth. Whether or not said crime was completed within Navajo Indian Reservation, western New Mexico.

Fifth. Whether said Navajo Indian Reservation is under the jurisdiction of the United States Government; and if so, has not the Attorney General authority to prosecute those guilty of crime committed within said territory.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present; and may I state that this matter, I feel, is quite important and I do not think it ought to come up at this time with about 20 Members present.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, I talked with the gentleman today and, as a matter of fact, I showed him that everything contained in the resolution and everything the gentleman asked for is in the report. Everything that the Attorney General has is in this report.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. No; there are certain questions in my resolution which have not been answered and I think we ought to have an opportunity to discuss them, which we would not have under your motion to table the resolution.

Mr. HEALEY. I understood from the gentleman he had no objection to this action.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I have no objection to having the report on the resolution taken up, but with the present attendance here I submit it is not fair.

Mr. HEALEY. The motion is not debatable, anyway.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. The gentleman makes it not debatable by moving to table it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] makes the point there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 26 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, May 15, 1935, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION

(Wednesday, May 15, 10:30 a. m.)

Committee will hold hearings on House Joint Resolution 236, to suspend issuance of nonquota immigration visas to persons born in the Republic of Mexico; and to suspend issuance of all nonpreference quota immigration visas, room 445, old House Office Building.

COMMITTEE ON THE POST OFFICE AND POST ROADS

(Wednesday, May 15, 10 a. m.)

Subcommittee will hold hearings on bills H. R. 5269, H. R. 5273, and H. R. 5288, pertaining to placing the Post Office Department upon a basis of efficiency and economy, in the committee room, old House Office Building.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII,

Mr. STARNES: Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. House Joint Resolution 285. Joint resolution to permit the temporary entry into the United States under certain conditions of alien participants and officials of the National Boy Scout Jamboree to be held in the United States in 1935; with amendment (Rept. No. 887). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. McREYNOLDS: Committee on Foreign Affairs. H. R. 7909. A bill to amend the act creating a United States Court for China and prescribing the title thereof, as amended; without amendment (Rept. No. 888). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN: Committee on the District of Columbia. H. R. 3641. A bill to amend section 559 of the Code of the District of Columbia as to restriction on residence of members of the fire department; with amendment (Rept. No. 890). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana: Committee on the District of Columbia. H. R. 6623. A bill to amend the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia in relation to providing assistance against old-age want; without amendment (Rept. No. 891). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Senate Joint Resolution 15

Whereas a resolution authorizing the President of the United States to proclaim October 11 of each year as General Pulaski's Memorial Day in commemoration of the death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski is now pending before the present session of the Congress of the United States; and

Whereas October 11, 1779, is the date, in American history, of the heroic death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski which resulted from wounds sustained on October 9, 1779, at the siege of Savannah, Ga.; and

Whereas the States of Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Nevada, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and other States of the United States have, by legislative enactment, designated October 11 of each year as General Pulaski's Memorial Day; and

Whereas it is appropriate that the anniversary of this day be remembered with suitable and fitting patriotic and public exercises in commemoration of the heroic death of this great American hero of the Revolutionary War; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States has, by legislative enactment, designated October 11, 1929, October 11, 1931, October 11, 1932, and October 11, 1934, as General Pulaski's Memorial Day in the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Fifty-ninth General Assembly of Illinois (the house of representatives concurring herein), That this assembly respectfully importunes the Congress of the United States to pass and the President of the United States to approve, if passed, the General Pulaski Memorial Day Resolution now pending in Congress: And be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded forthwith to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Seventy-fourth Congress, and to each United States Senator and Representative from Illinois.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs:

CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

Be it resolved by the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and it hereby is, urgently requested to amend the Hawaiian Organic Act so as to provide for an additional Delegate to the Congress from this Territory, the said additional Delegate to be elected for a term of 2 years in the same manner as in the case of the present Delegate to Congress from this Territory; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this concurrent resolution be forwarded to the Secretary of the Interior, to each of the two Houses of the Congress of the United States, and to the Delegate to Congress from Hawaii.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the petition of M. B. Eller, of North Wilkesboro, N. C., praying for the enactment of old-age-pension legislation, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate papers in the nature of memorials of several citizens of New York City and vicinity, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation imposing a special tax of one-half cent per gallon on heating oil, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate petitions of sundry citizens of the State of New Jersey, praying for an investigation of charges filed by the Women's Committee of Louisiana relative to the qualification of the Senators from Louisiana [Mr. LONG and Mr. OVERTON], which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also laid before the Senate letters, papers, and telegrams in the nature of petitions from sundry citizens and veterans' organizations of the United States, praying for the enactment of the so-called "Patman bonus bill", which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by a mass meeting held under the auspices of the Louisiana State

Federation of Labor, the New Orleans Central Trades and Labor Council, the New Orleans Building Trades Council, and affiliated unions, in the State of Louisiana, favoring the enactment of the so-called "Wagner labor-disputes bill" and the "Black 30-hour work-week bill", and also favoring the extension of the National Industrial Recovery Act and other legislation in the interest of labor, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WALSH presented a resolution adopted by a meeting of Regional District No. 2 of the Royal Order of Moose, at Salem, Mass., protesting against the imposition of the cotton processing tax and favoring the making of adequate tariff duties to protect the textile industry, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Greater Lawrence, Mass., remonstrating against a 48-hour work week and the importation of goods to compete with American industry, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions, and letters and papers in the nature of petitions, from sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts, praying for the enactment of the so-called "Patman bonus bill", which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials from the Andover Service Club, of Andover, and sundry citizens of Waltham, in the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the enactment of the so-called "Patman bonus bill", which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Aerie No. 1445, Fraternal Order of Eagles, of Hyde Park, Mass., favoring the enactment of old-age-pension legislation, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of Home City Lodge No. 793, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, and Railroad Lodge No. 487, International Association of Machinists, both of Springfield, and B. and M. F. H. Lodge No. 1286, Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks, Freight Handlers, Express and Station Employees, of Somerville, all in the State of Massachusetts, favoring the enactment of legislation extending the Emergency Railroad Transportation Act, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

PROCESSING TAX ON COTTON

Mr. GERRY presented a resolution adopted by the City Council of Providence, R. I., which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the cotton-textile industry, upon which thousands of residents of the city of Providence are dependent for their livelihood, is in a serious plight and in danger of destruction as a result of the processing tax on cotton and lack of adequate protection against the importation of goods manufactured by cheap labor abroad; and

Whereas many mills in the State of Rhode Island and other New England States have been closed, never to open again, and it is quite probable that other mills will be obliged to close, and as a result thousands of people will lose their employment and the very existence of whole communities is endangered; and

Whereas the city of Providence is already experiencing the disastrous effects of the break-down of the cotton textile industry: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the city council hereby petitions the President and the Congress of the United States to repeal the processing tax on cotton and to enact legislation which will give adequate protection to the cotton-textile industry against importations of goods manufactured by cheap labor abroad; and be it further

Resolved, That the city clerk is hereby directed to send copies of this resolution to the President of the United States and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Rhode Island.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in the proceedings of the day the telegram which I hold in my hand from Charles A. Peterson, commander Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, Department of New Jersey.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Department of New Jersey, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, respectfully requests that you speak favorably for H. R. No. 1, known as the "Patman bill." We want you to know that veterans' civil sentiment in your State is overwhelmingly in favor of the Patman bill. Never before has there been so much demand in your State for this piece of legislation. You are requested to read this telegram on the floor of the Senate this afternoon, so it can be recorded in the proceedings of that body.

Mr. WHEELER presented a telegram from R. E. Kelly, department commander for Montana, V. F. W., which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BILLINGS, MONT., May 14, 1935.

HON. BURTON K. WHEELER:

Just returned from a trip over the State, and find our entire membership and 90 percent of the other veterans in favor of Patman bill. Our membership believe that the passage of this bill would do more to return prosperity than any other measure yet adopted. Eighteen thousand veterans in Montana are anxiously watching this bill. I am authorized by department council of administration to thank you for supporting the Patman bill. Your further support will be highly appreciated. You may read this wire on the floor.

R. E. KELLY,

Department Commander for Montana, V. F. W.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I have been asked to have read to the Senate a telegram from a gentleman of my State relative to the soldiers' bonus. I send the telegram to the desk and ask to have it read, and ask that it may lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the telegram will be read.

The legislative clerk read the telegram, as follows:

FARMINGTON, N. MEX., May 14, 1935.

HON. CARL A. HATCH:

Have interviewed practically all business people, individuals, school board, county commissioners, chamber-of-commerce officials, and many others who wired and wrote you support Patman bill, and no one has changed his mind, and all want to see this bill enacted into law and respectfully urge you to override veto if necessary. There is no doubt that 75 percent of people this State and Nation want the soldier paid, and they honestly and sincerely believe that Patman way the sane and best way to discharge this obligation. Again thanking you for your loyal support on behalf of 16,000 veterans of this State, and you know that 98 percent of them in dire need of their money. Please read this message on the floor of the Senate this afternoon.

CASH AUSTIN,

Commander Department of New Mexico,
Veterans of Foreign Wars of United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The telegram will lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. VANDENBERG, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 4239) authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to convey to the city of Grand Haven, Mich., certain portions of the Grand Haven Light-house Reservation, Mich., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 623) thereon.

Mr. GORE, from the Committee on Inter-oceanic Canals, to which was referred the bill (S. 2288) to provide for the measurement of vessels using the Panama Canal, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 624) thereon.

By Mr. FRAZIER:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 130) making immediately available the appropriation for the fiscal year 1936 for the construction, repair, and maintenance of Indian-reservation roads; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire to introduce a bill and to make a very brief statement regarding it.

The bill which I introduce is offered as a substitute for title 2 and title 8 or so much of title 8 as is pertinent and necessary to title 2 of the social-security bill now pending before the Finance Committee of the Senate. I offer it at this time in order that it may be printed and referred to the Finance Committee for the consideration of that committee.

I desire to say that I do not submit this proposed substitute in a spirit of hostility to, or criticism of, the general objectives of title 2 or of the social-security bill, but by way of cooperating with what I deem to be the essential objectives of this proposed legislation.

The bill before the Finance Committee, which has already passed the House of Representatives, contains two distinct groups of provisions, and these groups deal with essentially different methods of financing and administration and should, in my opinion, be covered in separate bills.

There is the group of provisions which grants emergency benefits in cooperation with a State to meet present needs on the part of the indigent aged, dependent children, and crippled children, to promote maternity welfare, and to develop public-health service. These are emergency benefits, and it is, of course, hoped that the need for them will progressively decrease. A separate bill containing these provisions as they now stand would probably be approved by the Senate with little, in any, opposition.

The other group of provisions covers permanent industrial hazards in organized industry. These provisions should, in my opinion, be included in a separate bill, and it should be regarded as a permanent social-security measure, and it is these provisions and some additional ones with regard to similar permanent hazards, which are embodied in the substitute bill I am now submitting.

These provisions are essentially reorganized in order to make this industrial protection plan less burdensome to industry, less burdensome financially to the Federal Government, and more effective in operation. The substitute bill aims to furnish social security without delay. It proposes to make the plan entirely self supporting, and no permanent increase in the public debt or any Federal taxes, which is in harmony with the President's expressed desire.

An emergency measure by which the Government, out of current income, pays relief benefits to the unemployed, is one thing, and may become a very dangerous thing. A permanent relief plan by which industry, as an operation cost, pays for the depreciation of human machinery is quite a different thing, and deserves the name of social security. Only that measure merits the title of "social security" which furnishes not only relief from unemployment but the means to prevent its recurrence.

I wish to make it clear that I think the proposed social security legislation is the most important submitted to this session of Congress in its far-reaching and permanent consequences to industry and to the general welfare. I am a convinced believer in its objectives, and the substitute now offered is offered as a better way, in my opinion, or at least as suggesting a better way, to secure permanent social security.

Mr. President, it is not my purpose to go into any discussion of the provisions of the bill I am introducing, but it is my hope that when it is in printed form, it may have the benefit of the scrutiny and criticism of the members of the Finance Committee.

While I think it may be critically important to adopt a social-security act in the near future, yet this measure involves a new national and industrial policy of such large consequences, extending over so long a period of years, that it seems eminently wise and advisable to exercise forethought, and to take sufficient time before final action to convince ourselves that the measure we finally adopt is sound and socially usable.

I, therefore, ask consent to introduce the bill, and request to have it printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be received, printed, and referred as indicated by the Senator from Georgia.

The bill (S. 2828) to encourage industrial protection plans in private industry, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 5159) to authorize the Postmaster General to contract for air mail service in Alaska was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. McNARY, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 624) for the relief of Edward M. Brown, and it was referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

AWARD OF PUBLIC-BUILDING CONTRACTS

Mr. LONG submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 138), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That for the purpose of securing information so that the Congress of the United States may determine whether there is or is not need for legislation, and the nature and extent of such legislation as may be needed, the Judiciary Committee of the United States Senate shall conduct an investigation on the following matters, viz: (1) The awarding of building contracts and the works of public construction, including any and all matters and things connected with or growing out of the same; (2) the acts of officers of the United States and the agents of departments of the United States, either direct or indirect, in person or through their agents or emissaries, undertaking to influence awarding of contracts and the handling of public construction work in any manner calculated to show an unfair advantage, to favor contractors or materials or to allow changes or alterations in plans or specifications so as to show favoritism or make an undue profit; (3) the making, exhibiting, or giving away of things of value or the use of property or functions of the United States by any officer of the United States for the purpose of paying private rewards or securing a profit to any Government officer or person; (4) the solicitation of funds from persons charged with crime by agents and officers of the United States, or by persons who were expected to become officers of the United States; and (5) the interferences with agents of departments of the United States in their efforts to make investigations into affairs of the United States and matters and concerns connected therewith; that the said Judiciary Committee or subcommittee thereof may make and conduct said investigations and hearings and may summons and compel the attendance of witnesses and compel the production of books and papers and employ agents as may be necessary for said investigation hereby authorized; that said Judiciary Committee or any subcommittee thereof shall have right to authorize the perusal of files and records having to do with matters covered in said investigations and hearings during the session of the Congress or during adjournment.

AUTHORIZATION TO SIGN DUPLICATE COPY OF AN ENROLLED BILL

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives which will be read.

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 21) was read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate be, and they are hereby, authorized to sign a duplicate copy of the enrolled bill (H. R. 6084) entitled "An act to authorize the city of Ketchikan, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum not to exceed $1,000,000 for the purpose of acquiring the electric light and power, water, and telephone properties of the Citizens' Light, Power & Water Co., and to finance and operate the same, and validating the preliminary proceedings with respect thereto, and for other purposes", and that the Clerk of the House be directed to transmit the same to the President of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was considered and agreed to.

DISPOSITION OF LIGHTHOUSE RESERVATIONS

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Calendar 625, being House bill 7131.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, let us have the bill reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be reported by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 7131) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to dispose of certain lighthouse reservations, and for other purposes, reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, there was a unanimous report from the Committee on Commerce. The bill merely authorizes the Secretary of Commerce to dispose of about 35 lighthouse sites. I do not know of any opposition to the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Ohio if the report of the committee was unanimous?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes; the report is unanimous.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio spoke to me about the bill. Of course, I disapprove of the general practice, but under the statement made by the Senator from Ohio, I presume it is all right. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7131) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to dispose of certain lighthouse reservations, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, there are about a dozen committee amendments to this bill. All the amendments are to correct section numbers and errors in descriptions of property. I ask that they be agreed to en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendments will be agreed to en bloc.

The amendments of the Committee on Commerce, which were agreed en bloc, were, on page 2, line 4, after the word "section", to strike out "35" and insert "36"; on page 3, line 8, after the word "section", to strike out "35" and insert "36"; in line 18, after the word "section", to strike out "35" and insert "36"; on page 4, line 5, after the word "section", to strike out "35" and insert "36"; in line 21, after the word "minutes", to strike out "forty" and insert "ten"; on page 5, line 10, after the word "thence", to strike out "turning, runs south seventy-five degrees thirty-four minutes twenty seconds west to a stone bound; then"; in line 21, after the word "section", to strike out "35" and insert "36"; on page 6, line 14, after the word "section", to strike out "35" and insert "36"; in line 23, after the word "section", to strike out "35" and insert "36"; on page 7, line 7, after the word "section", to strike out "35" and insert "36"; in line 17, after the word "section", to strike out "35" and insert "36"; on page 9, line 9, after the word "section", to strike out "35" and insert "36"; in line 18, after the word "section", to strike out "35" and insert "36"; on page 10, line 9, after the word "section", to strike out "35" and insert "36"; on the same page, line 19, after the word "section", to strike out "35" and insert "36"; on page 11, line 6, after the word "section", to strike out "35" and insert "36"; in line 12, after the word "section", to strike out "35" and insert "36"; in line 22, after the word "section", to strike out "35" and insert "36"; and on page 12, line 20, after the word "section", to strike out "35" and insert "36."

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a further committee amendment which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 13, line 4, after the word "transferred", it is proposed to insert "and the conditions imposed by section 36 of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

NEUTRALITY OF THE GOOD NEIGHBOR—ADDRESS BY JAMES BROWN SCOTT

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by James Brown Scott, president of the American Society of International Law on the subject of The Neutrality of the Good Neighbor before the twenty-ninth annual meeting, Washington, D. C., April 25, 1935. This request is accompanied by an estimate of the cost from the Government Printing Office.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NEUTRALITY OF THE GOOD NEIGHBOR

Who is our neighbor? Everybody. Who is the good neighbor? Everybody who does right, helps others to do right, and knowingly and conscientiously refrains from any and all wrongdoing.

Ladies and gentlemen, I have a twofold confession to make: First, as a Presbyterian I am, as you know, in the habit of referring to the New Testament for a standard of good morals; and, second, as a Romanist—that is, a teacher of Roman law—I have developed the habit of referring to Justinian's Digest for the foundations of law for the future.

Therefore the thesis which I have the honor to maintain this evening is that of the Emperor Justinian, to be found in the Authentic or New Constitutions of Our Lord the Most Holy Emperor Justinian, Sixth Collection, issued some 14 centuries ago under date of the Seventh of the Kalends of July 529 A. D. [June 26], "Title XIV, Concerning Arms."

"Chapter I. * * * desiring to prevent men from killing each other, we have thought it proper to decree that no private person shall engage in the manufacture of weapons, and that only those shall be authorized to do so who are employed in the public arsenals, or are called 'armorers'; and also that manufacturers of arms should not sell them to any private individual. * * *

"Chapter III. Therefore, God directing our thoughts, we decree by the present law that no private individual, or anyone else who-soever shall, in any Province or city of our Empire, have the right to make or sell arms, or deal in them in any way, but only such as are authorized to manufacture them can do so, and deposit them in our armory. * * *

"Chapter IV. But in order that what has been forbidden by us to private persons and all others may become clear, we have taken pains to enumerate in this law the different kinds of weapons whose manufacture is forbidden. Therefore, we prohibit private individuals from either making or buying bows, arrows, double-edged swords, ordinary swords, weapons usually called hunting knives, those styled "zabes", breastplates, javelins, lances, and spears of every shape whatever, arms called by the Isaurians

"monocopia", others called "sitinnes", or missiles, shields, and helmets; for we do not permit anything of this kind to be manufactured except by those who are appointed for that purpose in our arsenals, and only small knives which no one uses in fighting shall be allowed to be made and sold by private persons."

Here we have a clean-cut statement of a complete governmental control of the manufacture of arms and munitions, the only exception being what we would today call, I opine, "penknives" for the sharpening of pencils or the removing of blots from a manuscript.

There is a generally recognized law of neutrality, but it is an old law—much younger than that of Justinian but yet an outworn law—adequate to circumstances which once existed but which no longer obtain. Since law should be in touch with actual conditions, it should change with changing circumstances, the circumstances in the case of neutrality being that, terrible as have been the wars of our century, those of tomorrow will be wars in which the entire populations of the belligerents will be directly engaged or affected, instead of being only remotely touched by war—as was the case when the existing law of neutrality came into being. But before considering what these circumstances are, it is desirable to refer to a more fundamental circumstance and its consequences.

It is unfortunately a fact that treaties ending wars are imposed rather than negotiated, although the forms of negotiation are ordinarily observed. But as in politics, so in war: to the victors belong the spoils—a precedent not established but followed by Brennus, when demanding a larger amount of gold from the defeated Romans as he threw his sword on the balance of the scales. Woe to the conquered! Force is not permissible in the making of agreements between man and man; unfortunately it prevails between nation and nation, especially in treaties ending war. In this regard, nations large and small are tarred with the same brush, but precedents of the larger nations appear to have the greater vogue in the international community. Two of these may be mentioned in passing.

In 1856 the Crimean War was ended by a treaty negotiated in Paris by the representatives of the belligerents. One of the terms of the victors was that Russia should keep no armed vessels on the Black Sea. In 1870, Russia took advantage of the Franco-Prussian War to denounce—that is to say, abrogate—the Treaty of Paris insofar as the prohibition of Russian ships of war on the Black Sea was concerned. This action aroused protest, and the signatories of the Treaty of Paris, meeting in London to consider the issue thus raised, signed a remarkable pronouncement on January 17, 1871, declaring it to be the public law of Europe that treaties could not be abrogated, nor their provisions changed, without the consent, amicably obtained, of the parties to the treaties. To this declaration France formally adhered on March 30 of the same year. Within a few months, the German Empire negotiated a treaty of peace with France—with which country Germany had been at war—by the terms of which France was to pay the then enormous sum of 5,000,000,000 gold francs (1,000,000,000 gold dollars) within a period of 3 years, during which German troops were to occupy a certain portion of France. Within 18 months the entire indebtedness was liquidated to the satisfaction of the German Empire. The treaty was thus lived up to by both the contracting parties—and both, it is to be noted, had also signed the declaration formulated at the London conference.

On the 10th day of January, 1920, the so-called "Treaty of Versailles" went into effect, the contracting parties being, on the one hand, Germany, and, on the other, the majority of the European powers signatory of the Declaration of London, which had prescribed that treaties could not be modified without the consent of the parties amicably had. The 15 years which have run since the 10th day of January, 1920, may truly be considered a period both of the making and of the remaking of treaties.¹ Why, then, make treaties, if they are to be made and remade but to be violated? For the violation of any treaty is not merely a violation of its terms but a repudiation of that good faith which is the essence of all agreements, whether they be words of mouth, written contracts, or solemn treaties.

The point which we have especially in mind is the question of good faith, which we venture to call the life of international relations, and the violation of which sounds the death knell of all friendly relations, whether between men or nations. Good faith, in short, is the essential trait of the good neighbor.

In no phase of international intercourse is good faith more essential than in the law and the practice of neutrality. Now neutrality permits nations to remain neutral in a war to which they have not declared themselves to be parties, and to carry on the commerce of peace in all commodities with all other neutral nations, and also with the belligerent nations, on the condition that each of the latter be treated impartially, that is to say, that the neutral nation does not limit its trade to one of the belligerents to the exclusion of the other but offers its wares to both alike.

There was a time, long since past but existing throughout the centuries, when a nation could not of right be neutral—"He that is not with me is against me"—but in the course of time, the neutrals being many and the actual belligerents of the moment few (leaving out of account the so-called "world wars", of which there have been a number), each belligerent welcomed a neutral trading with it, although objecting to such neutral trading with its enemy.

The United States came into being, both on land and sea, on the 4th day of July 1776, and were engaged in their first war with Great Britain from that period until some 7 years later, when a treaty of peace was signed by the erstwhile belligerents—one of the few peace treaties in history which was really negotiated and not imposed. During this 7 years of war, several of the European states, annoyed by what they were pleased to consider the violations of their neutral rights by Great Britain, formed an international organization which came to be known as the "Armed Neutrality", of which the Empress Catherine, of Russia, was the leading spirit. Before it became a belligerent in the World War, the Government of the United States, it may be added, was much in favor of the policy of armed neutrality as a means of protecting its neutral commerce.

Now the hope of the founders of our Republic was that we would keep out of foreign entanglements, and, therefore, out of foreign wars. Nevertheless our first—and not our least—Secretary of State under the Constitution, Thomas Jefferson, declared as the neutral policy of the young Republic:

"Our citizens have been always free to make, vend, and export arms. It is the constant occupation and livelihood of some of them. To suppress their callings, the only means perhaps of their subsistence, because a war exists in foreign and distant countries, in which we have no concern, would scarcely be expected. It would be hard in principle and impossible in practice. The law of nations, therefore, respecting the rights of those at peace does not require from them such an internal disarrangement in their occupations." * * *

Thus was formulated the policy of the United States as a neutral—the fullest possible trade for neutrals that the law of nations allowed, meaning the greatest possible restriction in the list of contraband. When, however, the Government of the United States was a belligerent, it trimmed its policy to the "needs" of war as a vessel trims its sails to the winds, demanding an increase in contraband and the maximum restriction of neutral trade with belligerents. This shift of policy was admitted by Secretary of State Bryan in a letter of January 20, 1915, to Senator Stone, then Chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations: "The record of the United States in the past is not free from criticism. When neutral, this Government has stood for a restricted list of absolute and conditional contraband. As a belligerent, we have contended for a liberal list, according to our conception of the necessities of the case."²

Whatever our attitude toward commerce in times of war, neutrality was to be our policy when we were at peace. And we began early. Indeed, the United States gave to neutrality its statutory form and effect. For was not a proclamation issued—the first neutrality proclamation in the history of the United States—on April 22, 1793, by President Washington? In it, however, out of regard for France, he did not mention the word "neutrality." In the next year (1794), the first statute of neutrality of the United States—indeed the first statute of neutrality of any country—was passed and became a law. So anxious were we to keep out of war that the duties of neutrals were specifically defined both in the proclamation and in the act of Congress and appropriate penalties provided for their violation. It may fairly be said, therefore, that the United States has emphasized neutral duties as well as neutral rights; but it is the insistence upon rights of neutrality rather than upon duties which draws neutral nations into war.

Our neutral trade with Great Britain got us into a passing trouble with France, resulting in an undeclared war, an imperfect war, or, as stated officially, in a leading case,³ in a "prolonged series of reprisals"; our insistence upon neutral rights during the Napoleonic wars got us into a second war with Great Britain in 1812 to 1814; and likewise our insistence upon neutral rights in the recent World War caused the Congress of the United States to declare war on the 6th of April 1917 against the Imperial German Government, and on December 7, 1917, against Austria-Hungary. In all the other wars waged by foreign belligerents, between the date of our independence and our participation in the World War, the United States remained a neutral nation, able to maintain its neutrality.

What would seem to be the conclusion to be drawn from such instances? The answer is that we are confronted with a choice: In the future we must decide whether we shall have war without former neutral rights or peace with neutral duties, for no matter if it was possible for the United States to maintain, with two exceptions, their neutral rights in the past, circumstances have so changed that today it is difficult—and tomorrow it will be still more difficult—to have intercourse with belligerents and preserve our older form of neutrality. The world changes, and with it international relations, both of war and of peace. It is high time for us to examine the old conceptions of neutral rights and duties so as to see whether the neutrality of the past can reasonably be expected to be the neutrality of the future.

Centuries ago wars were largely dynastic or monarchical affairs, due to the ruler's hope of enlarging his territory at the expense of a brother sovereign, the underlying motive being the personal desire for increase of power of emperor or of king. Standing armies had come in, and standing armies were for the most part found to be sufficient for dynastic wars. There were ports of military and of naval equipment, and commodities destined for them passed directly into the hands of the military or naval authorities and were used for military or naval purposes. Commodities sent to nonmilitary or nonnaval ports reached the civil population and were consumed without passing to the military authorities.

At the present day commodities reaching any port of a belligerent, or entering by way of an adjoining neutral power, become fuel for the war machine, because war is no longer a matter of standing armies. The belligerents are, in very fact, nations in arms, and commodities, whether they be solely for warlike purposes or whether they be commodities intended for the peaceful population as in earlier times, are now likely to be commandeered by the government and handed over to the armed forces, leaving the civilian population to starve or to shift for itself.

There is another aspect of this question resulting from the increased dependence of nations, both belligerent and neutral, upon the products not of their own lands but of other lands. In a word, nations today live largely by foreign trade, where in the past they lived largely without it. At the present time few, if any, nations could long exist even in peace time without exchanging their commodities by means of foreign commerce. And warring nations are especially dependent on the commodities which reach them through the channels of international trade, for the belligerent cannot feed the civilian population, since the nation is under arms; that is to say, those who can bear arms are conscripted into the service and the supplies of food produced are diverted to the armed forces of the belligerent.

Then, too, objects which in the past did not have a warlike use have become, by the progress of science, usable for warlike purposes, with the result that contraband articles directly usable for war—and therefore imported for warlike purposes—and articles of conditional contraband (conditioned upon reaching a port of naval equipment and then the armed forces) have vastly increased in number and variety. They may pass directly to the armed forces, in the form in which they are imported, or they may go to war industries for use in the manufacture of articles susceptible of a warlike use; but in either event these articles are used for the purposes of war and their number is legion. In other words, almost all of the imports of the belligerent have become, directly or indirectly, instruments of war, and in consequence are viewed by the opposing belligerent as contraband of war, the items included within that classification being increased with every war.

The growth of this classification has been rapid beyond belief. In 1909, for example, at the London Naval Conference, there were three lists of commodities: absolute contraband, consisting of articles solely useful in war; conditional contraband, consisting of commodities susceptible of warlike use; and free commodities, considered as not capable of warlike use. The first article of this last list—insisted upon by the American delegation to the Conference—was raw cotton, which today is the very essence of explosives! Indeed it has been said, with more truth than humor, that the only commodity not susceptible of a warlike purpose is "ostrich feathers"; but human ingenuity may eventually convert an ostrich into contraband by using his plumage for camouflage. Warfare being now upon an unprecedented scale, and future wars likely to be still more unprecedented, and nations being unable to grow and produce the elements essential for the carrying on of future conflicts, it should be evident without argument that belligerent nations, not merely the large but the small ones—witness the Chaco war between Bolivia and Paraguay—are dependent upon supplies from the outside world, if they are to be enabled to carry on wars.

Without mentioning the resources of foreign nations—which for present purposes would be invidious—we are justified in saying that the vast territory and the immense resources of the United States of America have made our country and our people to no small degree the source of the world's sinews of war and therefore the base, as it were, of hostile operations of the future. For if the warring nations cannot produce their own supplies or obtain them elsewhere than through importation from the United States, that fact in a very real sense makes of the United States a base of hostile operations, which is inconsistent even with the most rudimentary conception of neutrality.

Nor is this all. War being on such a stupendous scale, the nations at war are not able to obtain the commodities essential for the prosecution of their wars without money borrowed from neutral countries; and of all neutral countries, the United States of America apparently is best in position to supply moneys for a warlike purpose. This is plain fact, not theory. Before the Government of the United States declared war against Germany and Austria-Hungary, in order to protect its neutral commerce, the people of the United States were supplying not only the materials and the manufactured articles by virtue whereof the belligerents were enabled to carry on the war, but also the moneys to purchase them. In a word, the United States was financing or subsidizing the war, and we have learned by experience after the war that, having accomplished their purpose, the belligerent nations are unable to pay their indebtedness. The result is that we have not merely been a base of hostile operations but, by furnishing to the belligerent countries moneys for the conduct of warfare, we have been, while at peace, what might be called the supporters of war.

It cannot be gainsaid, much less successfully contradicted, that the Government of the United States declared itself to be in a state of war with the Imperial German Government because of Germany's violation of American neutral rights. The question arises and must have an answer: Are we to be dragged into foreign wars by a continuation of a policy of neutrality, a policy which brought us into a state of war with Great Britain in 1812, then the most powerful nation in the world, and which policy—in fact a veiled participation in the conflict—brought us into the World War against two of the countries which, before the outbreak of hostilities, were regarded as among the most powerful of nations? The remedy may be drastic; but the choice, it would appear, is between the drastic remedy and a still more drastic loss of human life.

In the conflict between commerce and human life, which is to prevail?

Let us consider, however briefly, what the protection of neutral rights of commerce really means. It means that certain manufacturers or producers of arms, ammunition, and, indeed, of all the various commodities which can be used in war, shall be permitted to receive enormous profits for the goods which they sell and export to the belligerent powers; and that this privilege of making money out of war is considered worthy of protection by the Government of the United States, even to the point of war. No commercial operation or profit can be weighed for a moment in the balance with human life. The profits protected under the law of neutrality are, in very truth, the profits from death. If a merchant trade in arms or ammunition indifferently with one or other of the belligerents, it is an indication that he is not interested in the triumph or failure of one or the other belligerent, or in the right or wrong of either side. Without having the United States as the base of hostile operations from which to obtain an ever-increasing supply of arms and ammunition, and, indeed, food-stuffs, would the World War have lasted as long as it did, or would the destruction of life have been so unbelievable? Can the American traveler visiting the graveyards in foreign countries put his hand on his heart and honestly say, "At least my country was not a party to this crime"?

Should the Government of the United States protect the trade of its citizens or residents in arms and ammunition and in all commodities (whose name, as we have said before, is legion) usable for warlike purposes?

Upon the answer depends in large measure the future of the United States, and the facts and their consequences should be well pondered before a decision is reached.

Ladies and gentlemen, I feel myself not only justified in stating but compelled to assure you that I do not discuss this matter from a purely academic point of view, inasmuch as during the entire period of our neutrality in the World War, from August 1914 to April 1917, I was Chairman of the State, War, and Navy Neutrality Board; and I therefore deem it appropriate to say that I am speaking under a deep sense of responsibility.

Without maintaining that money is the root of all evil, we know by experience that money got through participation, direct or indirect, in war is fraught with danger to life and to the soul. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided more than one case in which citizens of the United States have been taxed with and found guilty of trade with the enemy in a war to which the Government of the United States was a party. If during war some of our citizens would, for material profit, furnish commodities to the enemy of the United States, we can imagine how many more of our citizens would engage in furnishing supplies to one or other of the belligerents in a war to which the Government of the United States was a neutral, lured by even greater material profits which, according to statistics, are measured by incredible percentages and by hundreds of millions of dollars. Against this profit, however great, should be weighed the toll of human lives which follows in war's train. For in very truth, if we are not a party to the war in the technical sense of the word, are we not, in insisting on our traditional neutral rights, actually parties to the destruction of life—not to speak of property? Is this the role of the good neighbor?

Another and not unimportant reason why we should prevent American citizens and foreigners resident in the United States from manufacturing arms and ammunition and supplying foreign countries with them, is that these munitions might conceivably be used against us, if by any mischance we should become involved in war with a foreign nation whose arms and ammunition had been supplied by American manufacturers. The European press has recently had much to say of the munitions supplied, either in times past or during hostilities, by one or other of the belligerents to the enemy. The question, therefore, is not wholly academic.

What, then, should be the policy of the United States as an enlightened nation? Assuredly the Government of the United States should not make itself a party to wars in fact if not in form, as it does by permitting its citizens and residents to manufacture and to export commodities, the sole or indirect purpose of which is the destruction of the lives of persons who are not in the slightest degree our enemies. Nor should it become an actual party to the war for the mere protection of such commerce. If war we are to have, it should be strictly in self-defense, not in defense of commerce with belligerents, whether that commerce be in arms or ammunition, or in hitherto peaceful commodities such as we now know are useful for the continuance of warfare.

Now, in case of a war of self-defense, the Government of the United States would be in need of arms and ammunition. It should be in a position to supply that need itself so as to meet effectively any aggression which menaced its existence. If it be said that the manufacture of munitions and of other commodities usable in war is a private undertaking, and has been so treated in times past, an answer is that the Government of the United States has taken charge of the Postal Service of the United States, which was also in times past a private enterprise. If it be maintained that the exclusive governmental manufacture of arms and ammunition would be more expensive than manufacture by commercial firms, it may be said that the arms and ammunition manufactured by the United States would not be supplied to belligerents, because no neutral government as such can, even under the existing law of nations, lawfully supply belligerents with such commodities, and there would consequently be no question of meeting the competition of private industry in other lands.

The Government of the United States, as regards the much-discussed question of munitions, would thus be neutral in fact as well as in theory; and even if the cost of the manufacture of munitions under such circumstances should be greater, such munitions would, in any event, be made only for use against our enemies and not against our friends.

Although, under such an arrangement, our citizens would be prevented from manufacturing and trading in arms and munitions, they could still trade with the neutral nations in everything but arms and munitions; and, due to the fact that the belligerent nations would be for the most part unable to engage in exports, American merchants would have larger markets in other neutral countries, so that what our countrymen lost in the manufacture and sale of arms and munitions they would doubtless gain in the normal markets of the belligerents.

How could this policy, then, be inaugurated?

(1) By vesting in the Government of the United States the manufacture of arms and munitions and other commodities, if such there be, which the Government from time to time should consider as necessary solely for its defense;

(2) By denying the right to private citizens to manufacture any and all such commodities as are thus reserved for exclusive manufacture by the United States.

In the absence of treaties or other agreements providing what commodities are necessary in warfare, the Government of the United States should decide for itself what it considers to be commodities essential for the carrying on of war, and should deny to its citizens, and to foreigners within its jurisdiction, the right to trade directly or indirectly in such commodities with the belligerent powers. American citizens or foreigners subject to the jurisdiction of the United States might properly trade in all other commodities with the belligerents, but they would do so at their own risk and should be so warned by the Government of the United States in its proclamation of neutrality.

In this way the Government of the United States would be relieved of the dangerous task of protecting American commerce except in those cases where the belligerent interfered with legitimate trade from the United States to neutral countries. We readily admit that the belligerent may properly exercise the right of stopping and searching a suspected neutral vessel on the high seas for articles directly or ultimately destined to its enemy, but if no commodities destined directly or indirectly to the enemy are found in the cargo, and there is no other evidence of unneutral conduct, any further interference with the neutral ship is unjustified. In a word, no neutral vessel should, under any circumstances, be captured and taken into the jurisdiction of the captor unless such action has been fully warranted by the findings resulting from visit and search under the rules of international law.

Performance of neutral duties by the Government of the United States has kept us out of European wars. Insistence upon so-called "neutral rights" has more than once dragged us into European wars, and may do so again unless, like Washington, we lay the emphasis upon neutral duties rather than upon neutral rights.

May the neutrality of the future be based upon the impartiality of justice and humanity, and not upon the impartiality of profits wrong indifferently from the warring peoples. In a word, may the neutrality of the future be the neutrality of the good neighbor.

SALE OF "BABY BONDS" BY THE TREASURY

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter received by me from the Honorable Henry Morgenthau, Jr., Secretary of the Treasury, in reference to remarks made by me on infantile bonds, and my reply thereto.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, May 9, 1935.

HON. THOMAS D. SCHALL,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: It is my feeling that your remarks in the Senate on May 7, as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, are likely to create an erroneous impression, with reference to the United States savings bonds, which I feel it my duty to correct.

Briefly and simply, the situation is that a bond of $25 maturity value (and redeemable for that face value amount 10 years after its issuance and sale) can now be purchased for $18.75. The redeemable value of the bond increases gradually during the 10-year period, and that value as of various dates up to maturity is clearly imprinted on the bond, so that purchasers are fully informed. The bonds cannot be resold by purchasers as they are not transferable.

Your remarks seem to me to create two equally erroneous impressions: First, that those who have purchased United States savings bonds have suffered a 25-percent depreciation in the value of the securities; and, second, that a Wall Street syndicate might purchase them in quantity and resell them for a higher price with a 25-percent profit.

Your statement that the bonds are "already infected 25 percent" seems to me a clear intimation that they have declined in value from $25 to $18.75 since issuance, which is, of course, not the case. Your statement that "one-fourth of their face is gone, eaten up" seems to me to create a similarly erroneous impression.

Your statement as to the possibility of profit to a Wall Street syndicate, through the purchase of United States savings bonds, is in error. The maximum amount of the bonds which can be purchased by any one person or for any one account is $10,000 a year. But if such a syndicate could purchase $25 maturity value United States savings bonds for $18.75 they could not redeem them for $25 until 10 years later. Your statement seems clearly to imply that they could do so immediately. To make an investment which returns a yield averaging approximately 2.9 percent per annum can scarcely be referred to as making "a rake-off of 25 percent."

While the Treasury welcomes well-founded criticism of its policies and activities, I feel that I should state the facts as to these securities, as there seems to be some misunderstanding as to them.

Respectfully yours,

H. MORGENTHAU,
Secretary of the Treasury.

MAY 14, 1935.

HON. H. MORGENTHAU,

Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I thank you for your letter of May 9, 1935, with regard to the "baby bonds" you are offering to small investors at the bargain price of $18.75 for a $25 bond—the bond being deprived of the customary privilege of being transferable as a liquid asset, and therefore a "frozen asset" unavailable to the investor in time of need during the 10-year period to maturity.

You raise the point that a Wall Street syndicate could not purchase these bonds in quantity for a "rake-off of 25 percent" because "they could not redeem them until 10 years later." Certainly you are not unaware—living in a city where Wall Street controls the finances and where for so many years Tammany Hall owned both the executive and legislative functions of the city government, as well as much of the municipal court, if not most of the machinery of local "justice"—that the syndicate system for handling supposed "nontransferable" equities has a hoary history.

If your experience has been in law or banking you scarcely can be unaware of that system, which applied to your 10-year "infantile" issue, would be, perhaps, as follows:

In time of urgent need, as in sickness and death in the family, unemployment and business failure, accidents and other disaster, such as may occur in the 10-year period of the average small investor, he must go to what is known in most large cities as a "shave shop" to part with his $18.75 of saved earnings at such discount as the "shave shop" may exact.

The small investor signs a power of attorney to the "shave shop", makes it his fiduciary trustee, signs a mortgage contract of 10 years and one day to the maturity date of the 10-year bond. Thereby your Wall Street syndicate gets the $25, including the $2.90 per annum, and your small investor gets what his necessity and the greed of the "shave shop" may generously allow.

If we suppose that the small investor has a funeral in his family or loses his job, say, 2 years after paying you his $18.75, and the "baby" equity has 8 years before the trustee can collect, then the "shave shop" which discounts the equity will charge at least 5 percent a year, or, in this case, a total of 40 percent, besides its administrative expense and overhead and a profit on the deal. Instead of a "25-percent rake-off", the amount of your advance bonus, it may run to any amount the "shave shop" agency of the syndicate is able to wring from the victim "sucker."

"Unmoral" is the term applied to it by your fellow townsman, Frank Vanderlip, the noted ex-banker, who, I believe, has formerly approved some of your administrative program. I am not surprised that he pronounces this one "unmoral." Behold the list of its immoralities:

It piles up as "frozen assets" for a period of 10 years the small savings of the country needed to finance industry, aid industrial employment, and pay taxes to support government.

It aims to undermine the Postal Savings System, which 2 years ago carried over $1,000,000,000 to meet the emergencies of small investors, and every postmaster in the United States is made your agency to rape this billion for the support of a Federal bureaucracy.

It aims to undermine and demoralize the lifelong service of the mutual savings banks of the United States, which in 1932 numbered 594, had 12,500,000 depositors, and carried over $10,000,000,000 in savings deposits.

Your glittering bait of $18.75 for a $25 bond, or a ground bait of 25 percent to hook the small investors to your Federal fish wagon, is just another phase—is it not?—of your Fabian plan for political control of the banking and savings of the 48 States and 3,000 counties—the savings which hitherto financed useful productive industry to employ American labor in conversion of raw materials into finished necessities of life.

Your bait of $18.75 for a $25 bond is likewise "unmoral" in destroying the parity of all American bond securities. It injects the "cut price" evil into the American bond standard, sets up "cutthroat competition" with all other securities—an evil which the Government pretends to be fighting under the 731 codes of the "blue-eagled" N. R. A. You demonetize gold and pay $35 for an ounce, worth $20.67, as a bonus to destroy the gold standard, and hang up a 25-percent bonus to destroy the bond standard, thereby placing all the foundations of American finance under the political control of a Federal Tammany Hall and, if your bank bill passes, a centralized banking system in which the new Fabius Maximus sits as president with you as cashier and Postmaster General Farley as bank teller at the receiving window.

For information, may I ask you this question with regard to the investment use to be made with the billions you hope to raise by this campaign through the 48,000 post offices of the United States?

Will these deposits be available for investment in the socialistic enterprises of the Delaware corporation to which, on October 16, 1933, you and H. A. Wallace, and Oscar Johnston, set your hands and seals under oath before John P. Wenchel, notary public of the District of Columbia, as set forth in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 6, 1935, the corporation which in article seventh is to "have perpetual existence", and of which you, Wallace, and Johnston, are the first board of directors with a resident office at no. 100 West Tenth Street, Wilmington, Del., with branch offices (see subsection "(1)")—

" * * * to carry on all or any of its operations and business without restriction or limit as to amount, in any of the States, districts, territories, or colonies of the United States, and in any and all foreign countries."

For information, I am asking if the investment deposits will be available for investment in the enterprises of this Delaware corporation having "perpetual existence" with a resident agent at no. 100 West Tenth Street, Wilmington, Del., and engaged in such socialistic enterprises as designated in the following subsection of the articles of incorporation:

"(1) To acquire by purchase, lease, or construction, or in any other manner, storage and other physical facilities for the handling, carrying, processing, manufacturing, storing, preparing for market, and marketing agricultural and/or other commodities, and/or other products thereof."

I heartily agree with you, Mr. Morgenthau, that criticisms should be constructive, and likewise that the answers should be constructive. And to that end I look forward to your further letter of enlightenment with regard to the investment of the deposit advances pursuant to your "infantile" bond issues with 25 percent of their face missing.

With best wishes.

Cordially yours,

THOS. D. SCHALL.

THE BIG FOUR "NEW DEALS"—ADDRESS BY SENATOR SCHALL

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech delivered by me in Chicago at the Chicago Bar Association luncheon, on May 13, 1935, together with an article from the Chicago Daily News of the same date.

There being no objection, the address and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

About every third generation through history there is a relapse to some form of autocracy, when "government by men" is resorted to as a substitute for "government by law."

War, panic, depression, famine, and pestilence are the usual predecessors and handy pretexts for the autocratic cycle.

In time of "war or exigency", as provided in the constitution of the early Republic of Rome, a dictator could be chosen, whose will took the place of law. Thus Rome had its Sulla and Marius, its Pompey and its Caesars, its conquering eagles and its poverty, its deserted fields and its rabble of street beggars, following the dissolute Cataline and his reckless distribution of doles.

The term of a dictator under the Roman constitution was 6 months. A permanent dictator received the name of emperor. That is how the job of emperor came into political vogue. It was when the temporary dictator succeeded in his demand to have his autocratic tenure made permanent.

Some of the dictators of history are not so bad, but most of them are worse. All of them are characterized by certain marks of conduct and policy and viewpoint.

All the world dictators, Caesars, emperors, kaisers, tsars, down to the "new dealers" of today use conquering eagles to symbolize the fear they wish to create in the hearts of those they seek to subjugate.

Dictatorships imply suspension of constitutions. The denial of the Bill of Rights, except to favorites, a certain degree of censorship over the instruments of communication, the control of the highways, industries, and commerce, the domination of subject provinces and municipalities by the paternalistic power above, and the consolidation of both executive and legislative functions in the eagle-bearing commander in chief of the army and navy, the purse strings, and affairs of state.

All dictatorships, moreover, demand control of the lives, liberty, and industries of the inhabitants; the supreme rights over property; the power to dispossess of property those who oppose the imperial will; the power to tax, which implies the power to destroy; the power to borrow without restriction or limit, which implies the power to pile up mountainous debt, which means the taxation of future generations to come.

In short, the badge of the eagle, the suspension of the Constitution, the absence of a dependable bill of rights, the subjection of the legislative powers to the will of the executive, the control of industry and commerce, the control of transportation and communications, the control of the tax power and appropriations, a high public debt and reckless expenditure, and the complete sway of the public forum to command the worship of followers—marks all the autocrats of history, from the Caesars and Charlemagne, William the Conqueror, and Napoleon, down to the "new dealers" of today in Rome and Berlin, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and the United States of America.

World dictatorships are classified into two main types: First, those who maintain their dominance by physical force, the superior might of arms, the ruthlessness of slaughter; the sudden sweep of fire and sword upon the helpless peasantry and trembling townspeople.

Such was Sulla of Rome, the Hun chieftains of Mongolia, the Mohammedan chiefs of Asia Minor, some of the kaisers and tsars, and all Indian chiefs of uncivilized tribes. There is something of that in vogue still in modern times, as witness Chancellor Hitler and his storm troops, the soviet rule in Russia, and the machinations of the war lords in all countries.

But the more effective and seductive method is that of the so-called "Fabian school", the method of "gradual approach" by securing control and possession of the public resources and means of subsistence, the avenues of communication, the commerce and lands, the functions of government, and the power to tax, and then capture the imaginations of a subservient following by erecting huge public works and amassing a mountain of public debt chargeable to future generations, sometimes paid but usually passed along or defaulted or wiped out by revolution.

In 221 to 216 B. C., over a century before the birth of Julius Caesar, and 170 years before Caesar's assassination at the foot of Pompey's statue, Fabius Quintus, known to history as "Fabius Maximus", a renowned Roman general, five times consul, twice censor and dictator, was dictator of Rome during the Second Punic War. Hannibal of Carthage had conquered Spain, crossed the Alps, and given the Romans two defeats before his great triumph at the Battle of Cannae.

So Rome had both "war and exigency", the two conditions which under the Roman constitution provided for a dictator. Fabius Maximus defeated Hannibal by those famous tactics later known as the "Fabian method." He harassed the enemy by feints and artful dodges, destroying the bridges and food supplies, facing north while backing south, aiming west while retreating east, delaying and delaying the frontal attack, which earned for him the Roman title of "Cunctator."

Thereby he gradually undermined and harassed and starved the army of Hannibal into demoralization and ultimate defeat until Rome became world conqueror when its eagles surmounted Capua, Corinth, and New Carthage in the Third Punic War.

Fabius Maximus was the first "new dealer" of the dictatorships of Rome, before Christ, to lay the foundations of Rome's world conquest. That was about the time the Chinese began building the Great Wall against the Mongolian barbarians of the north. Two generations before Fabius, Euclid, the famous mathematician, had begun teaching at Alexandria and the Septuagint translation of the Old Testament had begun. It was not until a century after Fabius that Marius became temporary dictator, to be succeeded in turn by the bloody Sulla in the social war, and he in turn by Pompey and Crassus, and they in turn by Caesar, who crossed the Rubicon in 49 B. C.

It was not until 150 years after the administration of Fabius Maximus, that Cicero, the leading orator of the Roman bar, delivered in the forum his famous speech against the conspiracy of Cataline. It seems that Cataline was the first "left wing" leader of note in Roman history. He built up a powerful political following by gladiatorial shows, distribution of street doles, and organizing not only the street rabble and the underworld, but also the slaves, the unemployed, and the landless farmers who had fought the battles of Rome and been dispossessed both of their fields and of their means of livelihood. Cataline used the same dole system and publicity system, though on the smaller scale of 2,000 years ago, that is employed in the United States today, to buy the discontented and stir up the malcontents, and teach them all Rome owed them a living, and that he, Cataline, was their only Santa Claus and political savior.

Cataline, however, had not learned two angles of the political game which the Fabians of recent history have developed on such a vast financial, commercial, and publicity scale. Moreover, Cataline had not a position of power that would enable him to commandeer public revenue and official machinery, public debt and treasury deficits, and control the commercial forces of his day to put over any vast project of public doles and wholesale subsidy of the electorate.

The two angles which Cataline did not develop or had not the power to develop, which I here have specially in mind, are these:

First, he did not create the so-called industrial "emergencies" that would afford him the popular excuse for his "recovery" nostrums.

Second, he did not and could not plunge the country into the mire of treasury deficits, and he did not have access to the creation of mountains of public debt to give scope to his dole system. He neither created industrial "emergency" nor erected government bureaus to carry out the pretext of "recovery." As a "new dealer" Cataline was limited to the retail pioneer stage of a primitive era.

The Fabian cult has come down the centuries. In the time of Napoleon, we find the Rothschild family of seven brothers laying the foundation of their vast fortunes by financing Napoleon and then delivering him over to his enemies.

The Rothschild phase of "Fabian tactics" extended chiefly into the financial field. Banks are the credit instrument and foundation of all extended industry, commerce, transportation, public utilities, and even of the revenue and credit resources of governments in floating public debt. He who controls the banks comes very near controlling the business and government of modern society. Thus, when Roosevelt, in March 1933, employed the war-time act of 1917 to close all banks in the United States, most of which being solvent, he created the first new-deal emergency, affecting all industry and commerce and affording the Seventy-third Congress its plausible pretext for railroading into the statute book the various "emergency" acts drafted by the White House—such as the A. A. A., the N. R. A., and other alphabetical organizations. He now is bent on securing complete political control through his centralized banking bill. If he gets this over and continues the power of his N. R. A. the voice of Jacob will no longer be needed and the hairy hand of Esau will seize the stolen birthright.

The Rothschilds of the European capitals directed their "Fabian tactics" to the control of modern governments and business through financing wars and the war debts necessary to the building of navies and armies, arsenals and fortresses, the purchase of munitions and war supplies. No modern wars carried on by the large powers have been fomented without first consulting the Rothschilds and their financial branches and allies in Wall Street and the various financial capitals of the world.

Even in 1934, when the present war propaganda started here and simultaneously around the globe, Baron Rothschild, escorted by the American "contact man", Bernard M. Baruch, came over here as a guest of the White House for 2 weeks, then for 2 months in Wall Street and Washington, and then fishing with the President aboard the flagship Nourmahal. Can it be that the President feels that war is the only way out for the new deal? A scapegoat must be devised for the mountain of debt. Moreover, he may think war may be the only way to revive the so-called "heavy industries" and afford a profitable market for steel, copper, tin, lead, petroleum, and raw cotton for the manufacture of explosives.

Among the lieutenants and agents of this Rothschild, Wall Street, Lombard Street, Paris, and Tokyo aggregation of affiliated world finance, either wittingly or unconsciously, are the so-called "international bankers and brokers"—for whom Baruch acts as "contact man" between Europe and the United States, and between Wall Street and Washington. Baruch is the undoubted head of the administration "brain trust"—as he is the chief ambassador of the Fabian cult in the United States. He was chairman of the War Industries Board under Wilson. He has been "contact man" between the war powers of Europe and the United States, between Paris and Wall Street, between Wall Street and Washington, apparently, ever since.

In 1933 Baruch furnished his assistant, General Johnson, to the administration, to "crack down" American industry under the N. R. A., its "Blue Eagle", and 731 monopoly codes.

In 1934, when it was apparent that the N. R. A. was a "flop", Baruch began the war propaganda by publishing a book on the subject of commandeering industry and profits for the successful propagation of war, and incidentally the presumed "recovery" of the heavy industries. About that time he introduced Baron Rothschild to the White House.

In 1932, after Roosevelt had declared himself 100 percent for the Chicago platform, Baruch, during a week or more in early September, was a guest of Roosevelt at "Hide-away Park." After that visit Roosevelt denied the Chicago platform thrice before the cock crew and began unlimbering the new deal.

In Chicago, June 27, 1932, he was 100 percent for tariff revision by Congress, "with a fact-finding tariff commission free from Executive interference."

Today, he is for tariff making exclusively by the Executive, in a star chamber session at which American citizens have no right to a hearing and where tariff duties are raised or lowered by the Executive, free from congressional interference.

He was 100 percent for reduction of Government bureaus, and he would eliminate Government "extravagance" by "not less than 25 percent in cost of Federal Government."

Today he has created more peace-time Federal bureaus than all his predecessors combined, and he has piled up the costs of Government 100 percent.

He was 100 percent for a "Federal Budget annually balanced." In the 3 fiscal years ending June next, his accumulated Treasury balances in the red will exceed the deficit sum total of $10,000,000,000 with a deficit aggregate of $14,000,000,000 in 1936—the highest deficit mark of world history.

He was for the "protection of investors" who had been flim-flammed by foreign war powers and international bankers out of the bulk of $15,000,000,000 invested by Americans in foreign bonds.

Congress authorized him in the Security Act of 1933 to create a commission under the auspices of the Federal Trade Commission to secure the fair settlement of these American loans abroad and protect American investors. Not only has nothing been done by the Government to carry out the will of Congress, but the administration has not lifted a finger to help investors against a certain loss of $10,000,000,000 to $12,000,000,000 and a gift of that amount to war powers abroad. He was 100 percent for "a sound currency to be preserved at all hazards."

What has he done to redeem that pledge? He has struck down the sound currency which we had had for 50 years, destroyed the gold standard, withdrew gold redemption from all American currency, reduced our 100-cent dollar to a supposed 59 cents, until the only currency standard of the United States is that of a fluctuating and unstable medium of exchange depending upon the exchange values in 60 principal countries—a fiat currency bobbing up and down and around on the flotsam and jetsam of foreign exchange.

He was 100 percent for "the sanctity of treaties and the maintenance of good faith and good will in financial obligations."

Within the past 60 days we have seen the administration, through its War Department generals, soliciting appropriations for the establishing of secret air bases along the Canadian border, at the same time that the State Department was unveiling the tablets commemorating the Rush-Bagot agreement of 1817 by which the United States and Canada for the preservation of American peace and good will agreed never to militarize our northern border. When the Canadians came down to the State Department the other day to demand an explanation of this duplicity, what did the White House do? It laid the blame upon Congress for publishing the testimony of the generals, and letting the people of the United States and Canada know what the new deal proposed to do to them.

So far as "good will in financial obligations" is concerned, this administration has permitted foreign war powers to default on $12,000,000,000 of debts to the United States Treasury, a large part of which were incurred since the World War, and has never lifted a finger of protest.

Doubtless that was one of the themes on which Baron Rothschild and Barney Baruch spent so many weeks in conference as the guests of the White House and international bankers. It is significant that the Fabian spokesman of Great Britain, George Bernard Shaw, eulogist of the Soviet regime, came over here on April 11, 1933, on a flying visit, he explained, and at someone's expense appeared on the platform of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York City, to advise this country to do two things at once:

First. Scrap the Constitution of the United States.

Second. Scrap the World War debts owed the Treasury by Europe and federalize the banking power.

In July 1933 thereafter the administration created an industrial "emergency" by imposing with a blare of brass bands and street parades the first codes of the N. R. A. and "cracking down" on all American trade and industry. Within 4 months the industrial production of the United States had dropped 25 percent—although during the same period in 1932 industrial production had expanded normally 12 percent and Bradstreet's and the American Banking Association declared that the tide of recovery had definitely turned upward.

Likewise, in July 1933, the raid upon the farms was begun by the expenditure of hundreds of millions under the A. A. A.—the plowing under of 15,000,000 acres of growing cotton, the destruction of 6,500,000 hogs, the imposition of processing taxes to the present total of $800,000,000. Taxes assessed and levied by a Government bureau in violation of the constitutional provision that all taxes are the legislative function of Congress.

Today the Treasury daily statement carries a fund of $1,320,000,000 to subsidize farmers with cotton checks, wheat checks, tobacco checks, corn-hog checks, and checks for the producers of every imaginable crop to desert their farms, cut down their production, and help drought, disease, and bugs destroy the agricultural foundation of America, and thereby convert a self-reliant farm yeomanry into public charges and dole recipients, dependent upon a Federal imperial power—as in the time of Sulla, Pompey, Catiline, and the rest of the Roman dictators, and down through the Dark Ages when peasant serfs were dependent upon feudal barons for existence—or as exists today under the Soviet regime of the U. S. S. R.

You are familiar with the overwhelming economic disasters of the new deal. You know how Canada and Great Britain have expanded their production and balanced their budgets during the same period in which our production has crashed, and our Budget balance sunk into depths never before reached in our history.

You know how the legislative powers of Congress have been usurped by the Executive in violation of the Constitution and even of the old guarantees of Magna Carta dating from the thirteenth century. You know how our Bill of Rights has been emasculated by a system of licensed printing such as John Milton inveighed against in the days of the Stuart tyranny.

You have seen these phases of dictatorship, first, developing in the new deals over there, in Rome, Berlin, and Moscow, and by the Fabian method of gradual approach, by harassing methods, by "bold experiments", by use of scapegoats, by encroaching a little here and a little there, by gradually taking over the police powers of the States, the commerce powers of the States, and the creation of 150 new crimes by edict, the violation of the due process of law, the gradual conversion of our boasted government by law into government by men—and by such men without knowledge or care of either law or business, either industry or the rights of liberty and property—a fabianized and tammanized Federal autocracy.

Gentlemen of the Chicago bar, there is no time on this occasion to go at length into the details of this great fiasco under the American flag. Do you not see the psychology and philosophy of the entire new deal—which is the oldest deal in Christendom? Is it not this?

To "crack-down" by the Fabian tactics of old all the industries and resources upon which the people rely for peaceful independent existence. To destroy their ability to support themselves as independent sovereign citizens. Thereby, by Government threats, by Government interference with their business, their liberty and property, and furthermore by enormous appropriations raised by mountainous debt, reduce an independent and proud free people to the status of subjects subsisting upon Federal subsidies and doles, even as in Rome in the days of the Caesars and the Catalines, or in Soviet Moscow.

You will note that the $5,000,000,000 recently demanded by the White House, to be allocated by the Executive, is for the fiscal year 1937—an "emergency" forecast 2 years ahead. That the five billions amount to an average of $100 per voter for the 40,000,000 voters in the United States. Moreover, that the first half of the fiscal year 1937 begins July 1, 1936, the beginning of the 1936 campaign—when the "allocator's" chief "emergency" begins.

It was 70 years from the dictatorship of George III and Lord North over the American colonists in violation of the principles of Magna Carta down to the dictatorship of the slave power in 1860 and the firing on Fort Sumter.

It was 70 years again from 1865 to 1935, when dictatorship is again in the ascendant, and when the Executive takes over the legislative function in Rome, Berlin, Moscow, Washington, the seats of the big four "new deals." American liberty and union under a Constitution of the people won in 1776 and again 1865. Why not again in 1936? Today there is in America only one true party—the party of, by, and for the people. Let us see to it that it does not perish from the earth, for the President has usurped the functions of our Republic, and is about ready, like Louis XIV, to declare himself the state. If he permits an election in 1936 and by it is reinstated, there will be no future elections, and the Republic of the United States may be only a matter of history.

[From the Chicago Daily News of May 13, 1935]

SCHALL LIKENS ROOSEVELT TO A ROMAN EMPEROR—HE SEES DOOM OF REPUBLIC IF PRESIDENT IS REELECTED

Likening Franklin D. Roosevelt to the Roman Emperor Cataline, Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL (Rep., Minn.) today told the Chicago Bar Association that "if the President permits an election in 1936 and wins, there'll be no future elections and the Republic of the United States may be only a matter of history."

"The President has usurped the functions of our Republic", the blind Senator said, "and is about ready, like Louis XIV, to declare himself the state."

SCHALL, in addressing the city's lawyers at a luncheon, declared that in every third generation through history there is a relapse to some form of autocracy, when government by men is resorted to as a substitute for government by law. He cited as the four dictatorships today those of Stalin, Hitler, Mussolini, and Roosevelt.

USE CONQUERING EAGLES

"All of the world dictators, Caesars, emperors, kaisers, tsars, down to the 'new dealers' of today, use conquering eagles to symbolize the fear they wish to create in the hearts of those they seek to subjugate", he said.

The Senator gave the bar association a generous sample of his knowledge of history, saying that the "Fabian school" of dictatorship is more effective and seductive than the fire-and-sword methods which he accredited to Hitler and his storm troops and the soviet rule in Russia. He described the Fabian plan as follows:

"The method of 'gradual approach' by securing control and possession of the public resources and means of subsistence, the avenues of communication, the commerce and lands, the functions of government, and the power to tax, and then capture the imagination of a subservient following by erecting huge public works and amassing a mountain of public debts chargeable to the future—sometimes paid, but usually passed along or defaulted or wiped out by revolution."

CATALINE WASN'T THOROUGH

SCHALL declared that Cataline, master of the Fabian principles, had not learned two angles of the politician game which his more recent successors have developed.

"The two angles", he continued, "which Cataline did not develop are these: First, he did not create the so-called 'industrial emergencies' that would afford him the popular excuse for his 'recovery' nostrums. Second, he did not and could not plunge the country into the mire of treasury deficits, and he did not have access to the creation of mountains of public debt to give scope to his dole system."

THE GOLD STANDARD—STATEMENT BY OGDEN L. MILLS

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a statement made by Mr.

Ogden L. Mills in reply to the radio speech of the Secretary of the Treasury relative to the gold standard.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am amazed at the charge made by Secretary Morgenthau on the radio last night that the failure of the last administration to abandon the gold standard as early as 1932 was "economic suicide", as well as his statement of the course of events which, beginning with Great Britain's departure from gold in September 1931, terminated in the abandonment of the gold standard by the United States in April 1933.

I am amazed because the facts do not support the Secretary's charge or statement.

The following is a summary of Mr. Morgenthau's analysis of what took place between the above-mentioned dates: Credit and currency difficulties came to a head in Europe in the spring of 1931; Great Britain suspended gold payments in September, other countries followed; "in January 1932, gold began to leave the United States in alarming amounts, which was fair notice to all concerned that our turn was next; the panic was knocking at our door, but nothing effective was done to avert it"; gold continued to leave until loss of gold, declining trade, falling commodity prices and unemployment resulted in the disaster of February 1933.

Anyone listening to or reading Mr. Morgenthau's statement was led to no other conclusion than that, beginning with England's abandonment of the gold standard, the process above described was continuous, with constant and uninterrupted loss of gold exerting unremitting pressure, and that the obstinate refusal of the administration then in power to abandon the gold standard at once was the underlying cause of the eventual panic and of the events that preceded it.

What are the facts? From the end of September 1931 to the end of June 1932 we did lose some $800,000,000 in gold, due principally to the withdrawal of short-term balances of the French Government and of the Bank of France. By July 1932, however so effective were the policies pursued by the administration, such as unflinching adherence to payment of gold on demand, the securing of the Glass-Steagall measure, and the determined efforts to bring the Budget into balance, that the movement had definitely spent itself.

From July 1932 to January 1933 gold flowed back into this country uninterruptedly, in an aggregate amount of over $550,000,000. In fact, taking the year 1932 as a whole, our monetary gold stock increased rather than decreased. During all of the summer and early fall of 1932 trade, business, prices, and employment all turned upward. In other words, the fight for the dollar and returning confidence had done the trick.

Why did Mr. Morgenthau, in what purports to be a recital of facts, fail to tell the American people of the great inflow of gold during the latter part of 1932, of the actual increase in monetary-gold stocks during that calendar year, and of the sharp upturn in business during the summer of 1932? Because these facts completely destroy his case.

We still gained gold in January 1933, but beginning in February, due to the growing tenseness of the banking situation in the United States, attributable to increasing uncertainty and fear as to the monetary policies of the incoming administration, we began to lose part of the gold we had acquired—one hundred and seventy-three million in February and ninety-seven million in March. In April, the very month in which we abandoned the gold standard, our monetary-gold stock actually increased $29,000,000.

It was not the maintenance of the gold standard that caused the outflow of gold during the first 6 months of 1932; it was the fear on the part of foreigners that we might go off. It was not the maintenance of the gold standard that caused the banking panic of 1933 and the outflow of gold in the second and third months of that year, as is amply proven by all that took place during the summer and early fall of 1932; it was the definite and growing fear that the new administration meant to do what they ultimately did—that is, abandon the gold standard, and their refusal to cooperate in any way with the outgoing administration.

But, if as Mr. Morgenthau says, as early as January 1932, when gold began to leave the United States, "this was fair notice to all concerned that our turn was next"; if the ultimate crisis was due to the stubborn refusal of the then administration to take the necessary action, namely, the abandonment of the gold standard, then what is to be thought of the position of the Democratic Party, which, meeting in June 1932, under the leadership of Senator GLASS, pledged itself to the maintenance of the gold standard?

What is to be thought of the Democratic candidate for the Presidency, who, according to Mr. Morgenthau, must have realized that, from the standpoint of safety, we were already 6 months late in taking the necessary action, yet went through the entire campaign without ever disclosing to the country that the abandonment of the gold standard was the means of salvation? And what is to be thought of the now Secretary of the Treasury, who, viewing his country headed for disaster; knowing, as he now tells us, that the obvious remedy was unmistakably clear, never once gave the country the benefit of a word of warning?

Whether it was wise and necessary to abandon the gold standard in April 1933 is a matter as to which men differ. I hold that it was unnecessary and disastrous, and that we have not begun to pay the full consequences of the step taken at that time. Then and there it resulted in a breach of faith on the part of the United States Government. There is such a thing as moral suicide. It is responsible for the growing fear and uncertainty that paralyzes recovery, for the added currency instability that throttles world commerce, for the careless disregard of the principles of sound public finance, and for the constant threat of a devastating inflation.

But this much is clear. The facts do not support Mr. Morgenthau's charge that the failure of the last administration to abandon the gold standard was responsible for our troubles. And the theory now advanced cannot be reconciled with the complete silence and the pledges repeatedly given during the campaign of 1932 by members of this administration.

It is hardly worth while devoting much attention to the Secretary's flimsy claim as to the great contribution to our foreign trade made by the monetary policy of the administration. It is true—though not universally true—that under certain conditions the depreciation of a nation's currency may stimulate exports for a brief period, and until other countries resort to this and other protective measures. But the fact is that during 1934 we exported fewer goods in terms of the depreciated dollar than we did in terms of sound gold dollars in the year 1931, "when things headed toward a crisis all over the world."

There is one statement of the Secretary's from which the country can derive considerable comfort. That the administration is willing to participate in the stabilization of currencies, which I understand must mean a return to currencies of a fixed gold content, is distinctly encouraging. But even in this connection I am disappointed that the Secretary did not see fit to mention one of the indispensable elements of permanent stabilization—a balanced Budget.

COLONIZATION OF ALASKA—LETTER FROM CYRENUS COLE

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a copy of a letter written by Cyrenus Cole, a former Representative from Iowa, to the Secretary of Agriculture, with reference to the colonization of Alaska.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 10, 1935.

HON. HENRY A. WALLACE,

Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have been shocked by the glaring publicity that writers paid for by the Government have been giving to what is styled the "migration to Alaska." At Government expense a thousand men, women, and children are now on their way to that northland, and how many more are to follow them? These subsidized and deluded trekkers are called the "new Pilgrim Fathers" by the official propagandists. I know that this movement is not under your direction, but as the spokesman for agriculture, can you not do something to check this thing?

In 1923 your father, Henry C. Wallace, and I made tours of Alaska, he as a member of the Harding party and I as a member of a congressional investigating committee. We both looked at the country through Iowa-born agricultural eyes. He may have been more favorably impressed than I was, but I recall that he said to me at one time: "Some time now far away, when our lands have become exhausted, we may have to go up there to coax food from the soil, but I hope I will never have to go there to follow a plow with a mosquito net over my head."

But before that necessity has arrived and while we are still plowing under crops, lest we produce too much for our needs and markets, the Government is spending millions of dollars to send people to that Alaska, and the Government's paid writers are luring them on. To encourage them, we are sending 300 C. C. C. boys along to help them clear the land and to build their log cabins, and out of an already depleted Treasury we are giving each of the 200 families a credit of $3,000, which they have to promise to repay in 30 years. Of course, they will not keep this promise for they will find nothing up there to pay with. To lure them on the more, we are outfitting them with gasoline trucks, radios, doctors, nurses, dentists, and other impedimenta of civilization. Soviet Russia sends its victims to Siberia, but semi-civilized America is sending the victims of its professorial dreamers to a de luxe Siberia called "Alaska."

The ghost writers of the Government, who may all have college educations, in word pictures and with ordinary pictures, are depicting the Satanuska Valley as another Garden of Eden. But the men who have such visions of milk and honey may never have seen that Alaskan valley as your father and I saw it in 1923. May I recall some of the things we saw there? A thin soil hardly more than a foot of which is thawed out in summertime, with a thousand feet of frozen ground under it, for Alaska underneath still belongs to the glacial era of the world's history. On this soil all kinds of vegetation make a quick and prodigious growth, while the sun beats on it for 20 or more hours each day. But these quick-growing products are seldom matured and retain too much moisture. An Iowa woman in Fairbanks told me they always got their winter potatoes from Seattle. Moss grows everywhere. The reindeer does the best he can with it, but he cannot make beefsteaks out of nothing. It is not a grass country, and when hay is made the grass has to be cured on racks, for left on the ground to cure it would rot. But if grass is grown, as they say it can be, the mosquitoes will see to it that the cows do not give "contented" milk.

The propagandists, who are publicizing this migration, show us vine-clad cottages in Alaska. There are plenty of vines up there, but in nearly 500 miles from Seward to Fairbanks I saw few cottages of any kind, for few white men were living in all that distance. Out of one shack came a man and a woman who stared at us with the blankest and most hopeless eyes I have ever seen, eyes that haunt me still. They looked as if they had lived yesterday. What did they have to live for today? They also put trees in their pictures. The trees I saw were birches, aspens, and willows that spread their roots in the shallow soil that is thawed out each summer, and when their tops become a bit heavy they may topple over without the aid of the wind, for they can send no roots into the frozen soil.

It is to such a country that the much-blazoned new Pilgrim Fathers are being consigned by a bunch of dreamers who have found a new folly to exploit with millions of dollars that will have to be taken out of the pockets of the taxpayers. If we dealt justly with them, we would compel some of those altruistic and philanthropic dreamers to go and live with them and to hibernate with them like the bears. But they will not go where they are sending the men they are deluding. They will remain in Washington and live on $10,000 a year, or at least on $5,000.

I predict that the Government will have these new Pilgrim Fathers on its hands in perpetuity, and that eventually it will have to bring them all back, if they do not die, at public expense. How long and how many more such new follies are to be enacted at public expense? Have we not wasted enough at home without going up in Alaska to scatter other millions? If these farmers have to be rehabilitated, why not do it on the abandoned farms at home?

I am writing to you, Mr. Secretary, to appeal to you in the name of common sense and of the taxpayers, to do what you can to help stop this further wastage of both men and money. Surely you can say something to check this new folly.

Sincerely,

CYRENUS COLE.

CAN AMERICA KEEP OUT OF WAR?—ADDRESS BY SENATOR POPE

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE] before the Town Hall Club, in New York City on April 22, 1935, on the subject "Can America Keep Out of War?"

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Since Germany denounced the military clauses of the Versailles Treaty, perhaps no question has so filled the minds of the American people as that which we are to discuss tonight: Can America Keep Out of War?

That question has become exceedingly practical and its answer is of vital concern to every person in the United States. It has the attention of high officials in the Government. Resolutions to prohibit loans to warring nations and to prevent the issuance of passports to American citizens have been introduced in Congress. The State Department has been surveying the whole field of neutrality legislation.

Can the United States remain neutral in the event of a major war in Europe or Asia?

It may be well to examine, briefly, the principles of neutrality in the light of historic development. In the twelfth century a ban was placed on all trade by neutrals with warring nations, no distinction being made between combatants and noncombatants. Later the doctrine of neutrality was extended to permit neutrals to trade in war as in peace, except in contraband and with ports which had been effectively blockaded. In the European wars of 1613, 1780, and 1800 some neutral nations armed to defend such neutrality. Questions arising out of this doctrine were decided by prize courts of the belligerent countries. Obviously, decisions by these courts were unsatisfactory, and at the 1907 Hague Tribunal an effort was made to establish an international prize court. An agreement was reached to establish such a court, but the treaty was never ratified by the powers of the world. No such international court was ever created.

In 1856 the principal nations signed the Declaration of Paris, which codified maritime law on four points involving the rights of private property of neutrals.

In 1909 another effort was made to restate the principles of neutrality in the Declaration of London. This treaty was signed by the leading nations, but they never ratified it.

At the beginning of the World War Secretary of State Bryan proposed to the contending nations that they be bound by the provisions of the Declaration of London. This was agreeable to Germany and Austria, but declined by Great Britain, France, Russia, and Belgium.

In 1914, however, as a result of various compromises based on customs and treaties, neutrality had come to mean the status of nonparticipation in war with legal, impartial treatment of belligerents. To put it in the form of an understanding, neutral states agreed not to assist belligerents in military operations, and belligerents agreed not to impair the nonmilitary trade of neutrals. Such trade would extend to other neutral nations and to the civil population of the warring nations.

This is the same doctrine which, in the past, neutral nations had armed themselves to defend by war, if necessary. This is the doctrine upon which the United States insisted during the World War. In spite of the fact that neutral rights and obligations were very well established in international law and generally recognized by all the nations of the world, practically all of them were violated by the belligerent nations during the war.

The twelfth century doctrine of banning nearly all trade and making no distinction between combatants and noncombatants was revived by Great Britain and Germany. Unreasonable sea zones were established and illegal blockades of neutral points were attempted. Neutral ships as well as belligerent merchant ships, upon which neutrals were rightfully traveling, were sunk without warning by submarines. Neutral ships were seized and sometimes destroyed. Contraband was extended to cover food and supplies to civil populations. Ships of neutrals were stopped for the purpose of taking persons off. The American flag was flown on belligerent ships as a ruse, and mines were planted in the high seas.

The only justification by the nations at war for this wholesale violation of neutral rights was that conditions had changed and that it was necessary for self-preservation. In defending the acts of Great Britain, Lord Birkenhead said:

"All the measures adopted may not be generally acceptable (to neutrals), but the broad policy pursued, it may be safely predicted, will be followed in another war by any naval belligerent to the fullest extent compatible with continued diplomatic relations with neutral states."

And Lloyd George said in his Memoirs:

"Nations fighting for their lives cannot always pause to observe punctiliousness. Their every action is an act of war and their attitude toward neutrals is governed not by the conventions of peace, but by the exigencies of a deadly strife."

Of course, the United States made repeated protests both to Great Britain and to Germany. Finally, we were drawn into the war as a result of violations of our neutral rights by Germany. After declaration of war, the claims of our citizens for damages were no longer asserted and at the end of the war they were, in effect, dropped without any admission by Great Britain or Germany that our rights had been violated.

Not a single disputed point raised during the war as to neutral rights has yet been settled. The status of such rights is now exactly the same as it was at the beginning of the war in 1914.

It is true that the League of Nations was established by the peace treaty and the Kellogg Peace Pact outlawing war has been adopted by all the great nations of the world. It is thought by some that these documents change the whole question of neutral rights and obligations. During the World War and since that time, under the League and the Kellogg Pact, the whole pre-Grotian concept of just and unjust wars has been revived. It is asserted that the obligations of members of the League make it necessary that they cooperate in determining the aggressor nation and in taking concerted action to prevent or stop war by assisting the nation invaded. During the last few months this principle has been applied in the Chaco war where Paraguay has been declared by the League to be the aggressor. Since that nation failed to accept a proposal for peace, an embargo of arms has been applied to Paraguay but not to Bolivia. The United States has not cooperated in that effort. There has been such talk, of course, about the part the United States should play in such efforts by the League. So far, the United States has gone no further than to give certain vague assurances of noninterference with League efforts.

Efforts have been made to modify the old concept of neutrality. Resolutions have been introduced in Congress repeatedly, beginning with one by Senator Burton in 1927, and ending with one introduced at the beginning of the Roosevelt administration. These embargo resolutions contained a provision giving to the President authority to place an embargo on arm shipments to "any nation or nations." In no case has such a resolution been adopted by Congress. This country has gone no farther than to provide embargoes against all belligerent nations.

One is safe in saying, therefore, that the United States is still holding the old principles of neutrality—that is, nonparticipation in military operations of belligerent countries, impartiality in attitude toward them, and insistence upon trade in war as in peace, except as to contraband goods and with effectively blockaded ports.

Under this ancient doctrine of neutrality the United States has never been able to stay out of a major European war. In 1793, in the war between France and England, John Adams issued his neutrality proclamation. Every possible effort was made by the Government to stay out of the conflict, but by 1797 Charles Cotesworth Pinckney expressed the prevailing sentiment of the American people in his famous statement, "Millions for defense, but not one cent for tribute", and George Washington was appointed Commander in Chief of the American Army and preparations for war went forward. Happily a truce was made in Europe and the United States did not actually engage in the war.

In 1812, after long years of desperate effort, the United States declared war against Great Britain for violation of neutral rights. The war of 1870, between France and Germany, being of short duration and neither nation being a maritime power, the United States was not drawn into the war. In 1917 the United States was again drawn into European conflict.

That the principles of neutrality, under which the United States was drawn into these European wars, are outmoded is the opinion of many eminent students of international law. Dr. James Brown Scott, for instance, said in 1934:

"There is a generally recognized law of neutrality, but it is an old law, adequate to circumstances which once existed but which no longer obtain. Since law should be in touch with actual conditions, it should change with changing circumstances; the circumstances in the case of neutrality being that, terrible as have been the wars of our century, those of tomorrow will be wars in which the entire populations of the belligerents will be directly engaged or affected, instead of being only remotely touched by war—as was the case when the existing law of neutrality came into being."

In spite of changed conditions, however, the United States still gives allegiance to this ancient doctrine of neutrality, and it seems certain that under it this country cannot stay out of a major war of extended duration, especially where one of the belligerents is a naval power.

The prevailing sentiment in this country now seems to be that this doctrine of neutrality must be modified by restricting to rights and liberties of the American people to avoid conflicts with belligerents. Very well, let us see what are some of the things that we must do and try to do to avoid such conflicts. I have made a list of such matters as occur to me. Doubtless there are many others.

First. It would be necessary to control radio stations, wireless stations, and the cables, in order to prevent their use by agents of one side or the other. It requires no argument to demonstrate that their use by such agents would create serious friction between this country and nations at war.

Second. Also necessary would be the prevention of enlistments by citizens of the United States and of other nations within our borders in foreign armies, as this caused trouble during the last war.

Third. Loans and extensions of credit not only to belligerent nations but to their citizens should be prohibited as such practice inevitably draws our great financial and business institutions into support of one belligerent or another, as it did during the last war.

Fourth. Merchant ships of belligerents should not be permitted to remain in our ports, as they become nests of activity in behalf of the nation to which they owe allegiance.

Fifth. The United States should do everything possible to prevent other nations from flying the United States flag on the high seas, as that was a constant cause of protest during the last war. Perhaps all that could be done would be to prevent such ships from entering our ports.

Sixth. Submarines and armed ships of belligerents should be prevented from entering our ports, as that caused trouble during the last war.

Seventh. The rights of American citizens and property in other nations should be abandoned. Of course, this would cause violent objection by newspapers and citizens who would severely condemn the Government for not protecting its citizens. But to stay out of the war such a position, it seems, would have to be taken.

Eighth. Passports should be denied to American citizens who desire to travel on the high seas, or, at least, let it be understood that they travel at their own risk. It is easy to see that the killing of our citizens, even if they are traveling at their own risk, would raise a clamorous demand in every section of the country that our Government take steps to protect its citizens.

Ninth. Airplanes should not be permitted to land on, or fly over, our territory for the same reason that submarines should not be permitted to enter our ports.

Tenth. An embargo on arms and munitions would have to be adopted. Exports of these commodities during the last war constituted one of the principal causes of our declaration of war. The story of our trade in munitions, together with credit extended to European nations for the purchase of implements of war is a long and complicated one. The danger and difficulty of adopting any policy with reference to such shipments is apparent at the outset. Suppose that a war arose between Germany and the allied nations, and the United States imposed an embargo on the export of war material to all belligerent nations. Since Great Britain controls the seas and Germany manufactures most of her own munitions, such an embargo would be of distinct advantage to Germany and of distinct disadvantage to the Allies.

Is that a policy of real neutrality? Would it meet the approval of the American people?

The same situation arose during the World War, and Secretary Lansing had this to say:

"The principles of international law, the practice of nations, the national safety of the United States and other nations without great military and naval establishments, the prevention of increased armies and navies, the adoption of peaceful methods for the adjustment of international differences, and finally, neutrality itself are opposed to prohibition by a neutral nation of the export of arms and munitions, or other munitions of war to belligerent powers during the progress of the war."

Without doubt, the nations, seriously handicapped by such an embargo, would object to such policy with a resentment which can only be engendered by the passion for self-preservation. While such a policy, it seems to me, must be adopted, it will be attended by difficulty and danger.

Eleventh. The dissemination of propaganda in the United States by foreign agents should be prevented. The same propaganda, however, by citizens and newspapers of the United States probably could not be legally prohibited. Our constitutional guaranty of freedom of speech and of the press would not permit this country to legally do what Holland did during the last war in passing a law making it a criminal offense to incite hostile opinion against any belligerent nation.

Twelfth. Finally the greatest difficulty of all will arise in connection with foreign trade. There is no way except force for the United States to prevent the sowing of mines in the high seas, the seizure of neutral vessels and unarmed merchant ships, the extension of contraband lists to include every commodity to be shipped to the civil population, the removal and impressment of Americans into service, the drafting of American citizens abroad into service, and various other acts injurious to American citizens.

The placing of an embargo on American exports presents an almost unsurmountable difficulty. Manufacturers in the East, cotton farmers in the South, wheat farmers in the Middle West, with surpluses on hand, would protest to high heaven if foreign trade were stopped. Their surpluses would accumulate and would probably have the effect of a serious business depression. This would force a resumption of trade. It may be said that such exporters would be required to assume the risk of loss. This, again, would raise a clamor for Government protection of the rights of citizens engaged in legitimate trade under international law.

Some days ago I was speaking in a Pennsylvania town and had pointed out the things that would have to be done to keep us out of another great war. A young man arose in the audience and asked this question, "Since when have Americans who fought for their rights during the Revolutionary War, were ready to fight in the War of 1800, fought for them in the War of 1812, and in the World War, become so senile and cowardly that they will not fight for them in the future? Is a policy of surrendering their legal rights, ducking, and hiding consistent with American character?" I submit that by the time we do all the things which have been suggested above to stay out of war, there will be millions of Americans asking this question.

While I am perfectly willing to go as far as anyone in the adoption of measures to insure neutrality, I am firmly convinced that such a policy will be exceedingly difficult to carry out and probably would not prevent our participation in a major war.

I have long been convinced that another policy is better for our country to pursue. In every civilized community in the world another principle has been followed. Individuals remain armed until a collective system of law and order was established which gave them security. Then, they were ready to disarm and to trust to the power of the community, expressed in courts and peace officers, for their protection. No other way has been found in the history of the world to solve this problem. Individuals have never been able to isolate themselves, to hide in storm cellars, to run away from trouble, and have never been willing to surrender their rights as individuals. They will fight first. They always have.

As with individuals, so with nations. In my opinion, nations will never disarm until the power of collective effort gives them security. A world of law and order must precede the disarmament of nations. A means must be found for judicial settlement of disputes between nations, and a way must be found through concerted action of the nations of the world to prevent wars. This is the permanent way out. Only through such international cooperation and concert of action based upon understanding and good will can permanent peace be assured.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—DUPLICATE ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker, under authority of the provisions of House Concurrent Resolution 21, had affixed his signature to the duplicate copy of the enrolled bill (H. R. 6084) to authorize the city of Ketchikan, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum not to exceed $1,000,000 for the purpose of acquiring the electric light and power, water, and telephone properties of the Citizens' Light, Power & Water Co., and to finance and operate the same, and validating the preliminary proceedings with respect thereto, and for other purposes, and it was signed by the Vice President, under authority of the said concurrent resolution.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. WAGNER obtained the floor.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. WAGNER. I understand the Senator desires to address the Senate on the question of Philippine independence?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; just for a few moments.

Mr. WAGNER. Very well, I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, yesterday in the Philippine Islands, by a vote of about 25 to 1, the constitution for the new Filipino Commonwealth was adopted by the people. This action cuts the last tie of the old order and really marks the beginning of local self-government in the Philippine Islands, the ultimate goal of which is complete independence.

Many Senators who have been there, and some who have not been there, question the wisdom of Philippine independence. There is much to be said against Philippine independence from the standpoint of either country, but in the few moments I shall occupy let me point out several factors which always must enter any consideration of the problem.

First, from the very moment we acquired the Philippine Islands down to this date every administration has said repeatedly, over and over again, that we were not staying in the Philippine Islands as a permanent policy, that we were there only until order could be established and a stable government set up under the Filipino people themselves, and when that occurred we would withdraw and return to them their unconditional sovereignty.

Obviously, if that policy was wrong, we cannot in honesty change it now, even if we wanted to do so. We have promised this for 30 years or more. If there is to be any change in the present and future status of the Philippine Islands in their relation to the United States, the suggestion for such change must come from them. It cannot come from us in view of the fact that the independence law is nothing but a crystallization of the promises we have made to the Filipinos for 30 or 35 years.

Whether or not this is going to be economically wise for the Filipinos is a different question. Much of the difficulty ahead has been pointed out to them, in detail, time and time again. As the author of the independence bill I went to the Philippine Islands last fall and there, before the constitutional convention and in a nation-wide broadcast in the Philippines, I tried to inform the people of the islands about the consequences of independence. In a few moments I will read the gist of that speech, to which I hope Senators may listen:

With the coming of independence the American market which I have shown has contributed so much to Filipino progress and prosperity will be closed to your people, except upon the payment of tariff taxes upon the products which you sell to us. Again, the problem of national defense, like all problems of national existence for independent nations, will become one alone for the new Filipino Government.

Fortunately, there is a period of from 10 to 12 years to prepare for and cushion the pending economic dislocation. In order that we may deal with this matter in an atmosphere of complete frankness and candor, I am taking the liberty to point out some of these difficulties in the hope that this may be helpful, and the hurtful economic consequences which would result from a nonconsideration of these matters may be reduced to the fullest extent.

This is a very pertinent part of my statement at that time:

Let me illustrate some of these trade and market difficulties which must be faced. Bear in mind that I have already pointed out that only last year you sold to the United States, free of any import taxes, 60 percent of the entire agricultural production of the Philippine Islands. Now, for the 3 years of 1931, 1932, and 1933 you sold to the people of the United States, commodities consisting of cane sugar, coconut oil, coconut meat, copra, oil cake and meal * * * and other items. During this 3-year period the total sales of these products to the people of the United States amounted to $522,000,000, nearly all of which were sold without the payment of any tax to us whatsoever because you are now a part of the United States of America.

Listen to this, Senators:

Had you been then an independent country, during this same 3-year period you would have had to pay, like all other independent countries had to pay, upon this $522,000,000 of products which you sold to us, import taxes amounting to $440,000,000.

In sum, to state the same thing another way, instead of receiving, as you did, $522,000,000 for the products you shipped us in 1931, 1932, and 1933, you would have received, after the payment of those import taxes, only $82,000,000, a loss to Filipino producers and laborers of $440,000,000 in that 3-year period.

I further pointed out that they sell to us 60 percent of their entire agricultural production every year:

Again, let us translate these large sums of Filipino money into more intimate and understandable values.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TYDINGS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I am at a loss to know when the Senator is quoting from his radio speech and when he is not quoting from it. Is the Senator now reading from his speech?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I am reading from the speech. This is another paragraph from the same address:

Again, let us translate these large sums of Filipino money into more intimate and understandable values. Your sale of Filipino products to the United States during the last 3 years has been 174,000,000 pesos a year. Now, assuming that there are 14,000,000 people in the islands, these sales are equivalent to 12 pesos per year for every Filipino man, woman, and child in your population. Allowing six persons to each Filipino family, these sales represent 72 pesos per year for every family in the Filipino Archipelago. Again, assuming that the average monthly pay for Filipino labor is 30 pesos per month, it means that from these sales of Filipino products to us you have received sufficient money to provide work for one person from every family in the Philippine Islands steadily for 2½ months out of each year.

Again, the money obtained from the sale of your products to us each year is equal to 3½ cavans of rice for every man, woman, and child in the Philippine Islands—or you have received sufficient money from the sale of your products to us to purchase, at 30 pesos each, 5,800,000 carabaos, or more than 2 carabaos for every family in the Philippine Islands.

I shall not quote further, but it must be said, with the wide publicity which these facts were given in the Philippine Islands through the radio hook-up, and the fact that the address was made before the constitutional convention in which were representatives from every nook and corner of the islands, that the Filipino people have been on notice as to what independence means. The address also has been printed in full in the press from one end of the islands to the other.

I felt it on my conscience, knowing there were grave difficulties ahead of those people after independence became an accomplished fact, if they had been led to believe that everything would be just as it was then and is now, to tell them some of the consequences of independence and to present matters in such terms that every man might understand.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, I recall the speech made by the Senator. The Senator was as frank and open as a man could possibly be under the circumstances. I think it was most commendable. I think the Senator performed a great service. He has not read all of the address. I hope he will put it all in the RECORD at this point, or at the close of his speech.

Mr. TYDINGS. It has been put in the RECORD heretofore.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know it; but I think it ought to be put in the RECORD in connection with what the Senator from Maryland is now saying.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, well-wishers for the Philippine Islands often say that they think the Filipinos have made a mistake. That may be true, or it may not be true; but the fact remains that we promised them independence. They asked us to make good on that promise. We did make good on that promise in an independence law. They accepted that promise. The Philippine constitution has been written and has been ratified by the people. Obviously, there cannot be any change in our policy toward the Filipinos unless they themselves ask us to change that policy. Even then we might not do it; but, obviously, the invitation to change the projected course of events must come from them. We should be without honor and without logic if we were to promise them something for 35 years, and then give it to them and have them accept it, and then try to take it away from them. Whether it is good or bad does not enter into the question. The fact is that we must keep our word with the people of the Philippines.

There is much so be said in favor of keeping the Philippines as a part of our country. There is likewise much to be said against such a policy. Now that the Philippine constitution has been adopted in a plebiscite by a ratio of about 25 to 1, I desired to call these facts to the attention of the Senate, so that the Senate and our people in this country might know that the Filipinos have been apprised of what independence will mean to them, that they are not moving in the dark, and if they have pursued a wrong policy, our hands are clean. There has been no deception. The facts have been laid on the table, and the United States has kept its word.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I quite agree with the views which the Senator is expressing, but is there any move anywhere, either in the Philippines or here, to retrace our steps?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; but it is not as yet a pronounced movement. My thought is that as the transition period grows shorter there will be a vocal and perhaps a numerous support for a movement to change the present status as now conceived, in that there will be a proposal for some sort of dominion project, or for a larger measure of self-government. For my own part, however, I think that movement must be made now by those people if they expect us to consider it seriously. We are not going to wait until the very accomplishment of Filipino independence draws nigh and then considers it. We shall consider the adoption of the constitution and the inauguration of the new government, if I interpret it properly, as final. If the status is not to be final, if it is to be changed at all, it ought to be changed now, and not 6, or 8, or 10 years from now.

Mr. BORAH. I assume it will not be changed at all.

Mr. TYDINGS. I assume so, too, but I desired to put the country on notice that, so far as I can interpret the attitude of the United States, a definite policy has been pursued. If there is to be a change in that policy, the invitation to change it must come from the Filipinos. We do not agree to change it, but we will, of course, consider a proposal from them to change it, but if that proposal is not made now I do not believe America will even seriously consider it in the future. The time for action is now. The agreement is now being written. Both sides must make up their minds to accept the hardships as well as the benefits of complete independence. In my opinion the Philippine Islands are on their way to complete independence for there does not appear to be any unwillingness on the part of the Filipinos to embrace the hardships of independence if they can obtain the supposed benefits.

I thank the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] for yielding in order that I might comment upon this matter immediately after the vote has been taken in the Philippine Islands, and so that I might set the people of that country straight as to the attitude of the United States toward any change in their future status as I see it.

I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks the statement which I made to the Filipino Constitutional Convention in Manila on December 22 of last year.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS DELIVERED DECEMBER 22, 1934, BY SENATOR MILLARD E. TYDINGS, BEFORE THE PHILIPPINE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

Mr. President, gentlemen of the Constitutional Convention, and citizens of the Philippine Islands, I am grateful for your kind invitation to address this convention for it offers an appropriate opportunity to discuss our past common relationship and to consider the problems of the future incident to independence for the Philippine Islands.

For more than three decades our two countries and peoples, though separated by thousands of miles, have enjoyed economic and political union. During that period both countries have traveled far along the highway of progress. We are now approaching a permanent dissolution of our present relationship. Therefore it is fitting and wise that we counsel together and, in an atmosphere of an unalloyed truth and complete frankness, search for the means and measures most likely to achieve our avowed purposes.

HISTORICAL

The United States of America did not secure possession of the Philippine Islands by deliberate design. Our sovereignty here was a consequence of armed hostility, the cause of which was 10,000 miles distant from the city of Manila. At the conclusion of that conflict, through a series of unforeseen events, the Philippine Islands became a part of the territory of the United States.

However, at the very start of our sovereignty, a national policy was declared that our control and possession of the islands would be but temporary; that eventually, after law and order and a stable self-government were established over a period of years, we would relinquish all rights, control, and sovereignty over the Filipino people. This national policy, uttered over 30 years ago, has been reiterated by every President of the United States since the administration of President McKinley.

In 1916 the Congress of the United States formally proclaimed it through the enactment of the Jones law.

This year upon the open, direct, and specific request of the Filipino people, who sent representatives to Washington to obtain it, the Government of the United States, in spite of the great difficulties attendant upon it, enacted a law which provides for complete and absolute independence for the people of the Philippine Islands within a definite and short period of time.

I repeat that this action upon the part of the American Congress was in line with continuously declared American policy of 34 years standing; but, more particularly, action was taken at this time upon the insistent request of the authorized representatives of the Filipino people who were sent to Washington to obtain the enactment of the independence law.

Following the passage of that law, commonly known as the "Tydings-McDuffie Act", its provisions were considered and discussed by the Philippine Legislature, which body accepted it for and on behalf of the Filipino people on May 1, 1934.

THE TYDINGS-McDUFFIE ACT

Naturally, in the enactment of any independence law there were many differing opinions for the disposition of the matter. There were those who thought that immediate independence was best; others wanted the independence question postponed for from 20 to 25 years, while still others held that independence should not be considered at all at this time.

After extensive hearings, the time limit of approximately 12 years from the date of the enactment of the law was thought to offer the best opportunity to carry out the national policy of the United States and to accede to the Filipino request for definite action.

The law itself, among other things, provides for certain mandatory provisions in the new Philippine constitution prior to actual independence; for submission of that constitution to the President of the United States for his approval; then for submission of the Constitution to the Filipino people for their approval; for matters affecting international treaties and property rights; for political relations of the islands with the United States pending complete independence; for recognition of Filipino independence and for the withdrawal of American sovereignty over the islands; for the neutralization of the Philippines; for notification to foreign governments of actual and complete independence; for tariff duties before and after independence; for Filipino immigration to continental United States; for the payment of the Philippine bonded indebtedness, which Philippine bonds were sold by the United States of America, and for other matters of equal import.

Like all legislative matters, the independence act may have its imperfections, yet it is doubtful if another could be drawn, which as a whole would better accomplish the objects desired and which would have been at that time acceptable to both the American and Filipino people.

THE EXPORT TAX AND PAYMENT OF PHILIPPINE BONDED INDEBTEDNESS

The export-tax provisions of the independence law seem to have evoked the most discussion in the islands. It is well to note that these export-tax provisions were inserted to accomplish the three following purposes: First, to settle accounts completely between the Philippines and the United States when actual independence is obtained so that the United States might not be kept in the position of morally guaranteeing the payment of another country's obligation, in which country it has no voice in the conduct of affairs; secondly, the payment of this debt will start the independent Filipino nation upon its way free of all indebtedness whatsoever, and hence place the new Filipino nation in the strongest position possible for the settlement of then existing independence problems and for conducting the affairs, both internal and external, of an entirely newly born country; third, for 5 years the export tax does not apply on Filipino products. These taxes begin and increase the sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth years. After 10 years, while export taxes on Filipino products are no longer levied, import taxes will necessarily have to be paid by Filipino producers, many times greater than the export taxes, whenever the Filipino people send their products to the United States for sale there. Such taxes are now paid by producers of all other countries upon the entry of their products into the United States. Obviously, therefore, the imposition of the export taxes will commence to prepare the Filipino producer for the situation which will confront him when, as a citizen of an independent country, he desires to continue to sell his products in the United States. To make no provision for such a contingency and to have it all fall upon the shoulders of the Filipino producers at one time would be cruel and inhuman and cause hardships which a gradual infliction of such taxes will, to some extent, mitigate.

I repeat that to provide for all the manifold problems in an independence law was not easy. However, every attempt was made to do so with the aims of both nations in view and so as to accomplish the desired results in the shortest period of time and with the least injury to both people concerned.

THE RECORD OF THE UNITED STATES IN THE PHILIPPINES

Here in the presence of this convention, which is engaged in writing a constitution which it is hoped will be the aegis for a progressive, prosperous, and humane people, I cannot refrain, even at the price of immodesty, from feeling a deep sense of pride in the large and unselfish contributions and accomplishments which the United States has made to the Filipino people. You have been given ordered and modern liberty without coercion; an unprecedented prosperity without exploitation; and, with these gifts, you have been furnished national defense of your property and people without any cost to, aid from, or responsibility of your provisional government of your people. Humanity and progress have marked our past relationship. America's real heart, real intention, and worth-while contributions are plainly written today in the law and order which prevails in these islands and in the prosperous contentment plainly visible in the faces of the Filipino people. I doubt if what has been done in the Philippine Islands has been matched before by any country in all the pages of the world's history.

ECONOMIC FACTORS IN THE PAST

We are now about to sever this dual relationship. At a not-far-distant date your country and mine will walk in separate highways down the corridors of the future. As you move through the transition period of the Commonwealth government and into the phase of complete and absolute independence the pathway at times will be difficult. Much of this difficulty is unavoidable. These difficulties are largely due to a new political economy which now becomes necessary upon the part of the Philippine Islands.

Since 1909 products produced in the Philippine Islands have been admitted free—that is, without the payment of any import taxes at all—into the United States of America. With actual independence these free markets will be closed, as they are now closed to all other countries except the Philippine Islands. This will call for a rearrangement of the economic life of the Filipino people. Let me point out how important these free markets are to the workers and producers of the Philippine Islands.

In 1933 the Philippine Department of Agriculture and Natural Resources stated that the total value of your entire agricultural production was $284,000,000. It also reported that of this production $174,000,000 was shipped and sold to the United States. In other words, 60 percent of the entire agricultural production of the Philippine Islands in the year 1933 was sold in the free markets of the United States and only 40 percent was consumed at home or sold elsewhere. Bear in mind that this agricultural production came from the Philippine Islands without the payment of any import tax whatsoever when it entered the United States. After independence this will not be the case.

For the past 25 years the Filipino people have had complete and easy access to the richest market in the world, and in that market you have enjoyed both a visible and invisible balance of trade. The visible balance of trade arising from the exchange of products between the Philippines and the United States, not including gold, amounts to about $60,000,000 a year, over many years, which is in your favor. This shows that you have sold us $60,000,000 per year more of your products than you have bought of products from the United States of America. This caused a flow of wealth from the United States to the Philippine Islands, which has made your people prosperous and which has raised the standard of living here to a point which, I believe, is higher than that of any other people in the Orient.

Moreover, it has permitted the Filipino people, with the encouragement and help and guarantees of the United States Government to build highways, construct railroads, build hospitals and improve health, create parks and playgrounds, establish a system of education so that the masses might taste of its benefits, to own lands and homes, and in general to provide your fellows with the luxuries in many cases and the necessities in most cases which are demanded by prosperous people everywhere.

During this period of time American officials and employees were being gradually supplanted in governmental offices by Filipinos, and while the whole progressive pattern was being woven you have not had to bear a single centavo of the cost of full and complete national defense and protection of the United States Army and Navy, which have been at your service. The officers and men and equipment of this military and naval establishment, supported entirely by the people and resources of the United States, cost the American taxpayer about two-thirds of every tax peso which he pays to the Government of the United States. They have been available, nevertheless, without financial cost to you to protect and defend the Philippine Islands whenever your territory was in danger.

ECONOMIC FACTORS OF THE FUTURE

With the coming of independence, the American market which I have shown has contributed so much to Filipino progress and prosperity will be closed to your people, except upon the payment of tariff taxes upon the products you sell to us. Again, the problem of national defense, like all problems of national existence for independent nations, will become one alone for the new Filipino government.

Fortunately, there is a period of from 10 to 12 years to prepare for and cushion the pending economic dislocation. In order that we may deal with this matter in an atmosphere of complete frankness and candor, I am taking the liberty to point out some of these difficulties in the hope that this may be helpful, and the hurtful economic consequences which would result from a non-consideration of these matters may be reduced to the fullest extent.

Let me illustrate some of these trade and market difficulties which must be faced. Bear in mind that I have already pointed out that only last year you sold to the United States, free of any import taxes, 60 percent of the entire agricultural production of the Philippine Islands. Now, for the 3 years of 1931, 1932, and 1933, you sold to the people of the United States commodities consisting of cane sugar, coconut oil, coconut meat, copra, oil cake and meal, cordage of Manila hemp, cotton wearing apparel, cotton laces and embroideries, fiber hats, cigars and cheroots, tobacco, cabinet wood, pearl and shell buttons, pineapples, and other items. During this 3-year period the total sales of these products to the people of the United States amounted to $522,000,000, nearly all of which were sold without the payment of any tax to us whatsoever, because you are now a part of the United States of America.

Had you been then an independent country, during this same 3-year period, you would have had to pay, like all other independent countries have to pay, upon this $522,000,000 of products which you sold to us, import taxes amounting to $440,000,000.

In sum, to state the same thing another way, instead of receiving, as you did, $522,000,000 for the products you shipped us in 1931, 1932, and 1933, you would have received, after the payment of these import taxes, only $82,000,000, a loss to Filipino producers and laborers of $440,000,000 in that 3-year period.

Again, let us translate these large sums of Filipino money into more intimate and understandable values. Your sale of Filipino products to the United States during the last 3 years has been $174,000,000 a year. Now, assuming that there are 14,000,000 people in the islands, these sales are equivalent to $12 per year for every Filipino man, woman, and child in your population. Allowing six persons to each Filipino family these sales represent $72 per year for every family in the Philippine Archipelago. Again, assuming that the average monthly pay for Philippine labor is $30 per month, it means that from these sales of Filipino products to us you have received sufficient money to provide work for one person from every family in the Philippine Islands steadily for 2½ months out of each year. Again, the money obtained from the sale of your products to us each year is equal to 3½ cavans of rice for every man, woman, and child in the Philippine Islands, or you have received sufficient money from the sale of your products to us to purchase, at $30 each, 5,800,000 carabaos, or more than 2 carabaos for every family in the Philippine Islands.

These illustrations show how much of the life and prosperity of the Philippine Islands is dependent upon the sale of your products to the people of the United States. They also show the great hardship which would come to the Filipino people, as a result of absolute and complete independence, when the sale of much of your products in the United States would become impossible if you would then be required to pay the import taxes which I have commented on before. They likewise show the justification of imposing the export taxes upon your products, commencing 5 years from now, so as to prepare the Filipino nation for the circumstances which will confront it when complete independence is obtained.

Further, it can be seen that it will be difficult for Filipino business men and institutions to obtain loans and capital to continue the development of your natural resources until you have demonstrated your ability to deal with the economic conditions I have mentioned and to set up a stable and workable political economy which will give to capital the element of safety which it requires in making investments.

Anticipating the full consequence of complete and absolute independence, it will be necessary to make such cost-of-production adjustment of the things which you produce and sell as will permit the Philippines to compete successfully with other countries producing similar products for sale not only in the United States market but in all the markets of the world.

That such cost-of-production adjustments are necessary can be illustrated by commenting on a single product which you export in great abundance. The present cost, c. i. f., to New York of sugar averages $5.40 per 100 pounds, compared with the Cuban cost of $3.80 per 100 pounds and the Javan cost of about $2 per 100 pounds. The higher cost of producing Philippine sugar is due partly to lower production per acre as compared with Java, partly to higher wages, and partly to other factors. The cost of production perhaps could be reduced so as to permit competition with Cuban sugar only by severely cutting down capital investment, which is high in the Philippine Islands where most of the mills have been built when construction and material costs were high. It is doubtful, however, whether this alone would permit Philippine sugar to compete with that of Cuba and Java after you are an independent nation. Indeed, some informed Filipino economists have stated it will be necessary to reduce wages by at least 50 percent. The same effect could be obtained by devaluing the peso, but it should be stated that such an expedient is attended with other difficulties and may offer but temporary relief.

DIFFICULTIES OF IMMEDIATE INDEPENDENCE

Such economic dislocation as has been shown for the people of the Philippine Islands after independence, if unprovided for during the transition period, will result in great hardship throughout the islands, and for that reason a period of 12 years was selected in preference to immediate independence, although it was the desire of the United States to grant independence at once if the circumstances would have permitted such action to be taken. It is my own belief that persons in both countries who are conversant with economic factors, whatever their emotional, political, and spiritual impulses may be, will not, after a full examination of the facts, contend that immediate independence is the best solution of this problem. Certainly it is doubtful whether such a contention would be made by informed persons if they had the real welfare of the Filipino people at heart or if they did not wish to destroy all the accomplishment of the Philippines while under the United States of America.

To grant complete and absolute independence to the Philippine Islands tomorrow, without giving time for the necessary readjustments, would destroy overnight the export trade of the Filipino people. At the same time there would be such a decrease in the national income of the Filipino people and such a material reduction in the sources of taxation that much of the education, health, transportation, and general prosperity of the islands would disappear and the new government would be forced to carry a load which, to say the least, would be extremely difficult for any nation to bear.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

With the withdrawal of sovereignty of the United States from the Philippine Islands and the accomplishment of complete and absolute independence by the Filipino nation the problem of national defense for the islands likewise must undergo a new consideration. When the flag of the United States of America comes down and there is raised the flag of the new Filipino nation the responsibility for your national defense passes from the hands of the United States to the new Filipino government. To expect the United States to bear responsibility for the acts of a nation over which it had no control whatsoever would be as illogical as it would be to ask the Filipino people, once they are independent, to defend the shores of the United States. Sovereignty and responsibility walk hand in hand. Without sovereignty there cannot be responsibility.

THE NEW FILIPINO NATION

I think the record will show that your speaker has on every occasion in the Congress of the United States been a champion of Filipino rights. Whenever matters affecting our mutual relationship have arisen I have tried, within the limits of my ability, to sincerely present the Filipino view and to safeguard, insofar as I might, Filipino interests. I have no intention at this time to alter that position. Because of my record in the American Congress toward Filipino matters, because of the great affection which I have for the people of the Philippine Islands, and because I wish you well in your new venture of nationhood, I have taken the liberty of pointing out the difficulties ahead. In the not far distant future the Philippine Islands will achieve complete and absolute independence from the United States. What does complete and absolute independence mean for any nation? Some contend that it means the right and privilege to govern itself. Does it not mean more than this in reality? Does it not mean that it must devise a wise political economy, so that from that economy it can produce sufficient governmental revenue to provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, establish a system of education for the masses of the people, improve and safeguard their sanitation and health, build roads and foster other means of land and water transportation to assist in the exchange of their commerce, establish courts and provide sufficient police force to support and enforce the laws of the nation, and, in addition, to govern so wisely its people and commerce that the government will have sufficient revenue at all times to promote the mass progress of the people within its territorial limits and to adequately defend them against attack from without?

This is the goal to which the Filipino people aspire. You have asked for the opportunity to reach this goal and have stated you are ready to assume the responsibilities which go hand in hand with the privileges of an independent nation. You have stated that you are ready to undertake the solution of the attendant difficulties; that you are willing to bear the grave responsibilities of nationhood. Therefore the United States is beginning the termination of its sovereignty in the Philippine Islands. The people of the Philippine Islands are taking up the responsibilities of their future destiny.

The United States of America has kept its word. Its promise is approaching fulfillment. Your request for action has not been denied. It is presumed that you were just as sincere in making this request of the United States as the United States was sincere in making its promise to grant ultimate independence to your people.

I believe our contact with your people and temporary control over your destiny will prove in after years to have been one of the most unselfish and idealistic contact of one people with another. This fact, I hope, will find room for expression upon the future pages of Philippine history, and I believe the historian will say that my country has tried to be helpful and has improved immeasurably the well-being of the people of these islands.

I have welcomed this opportunity to address you and, through you, the Filipino people. I have tried to do so in a spirit of good will, sincerity and frankness. I have ventured to comment briefly upon your future problems, to explain why certain measures have been adopted and to point out the obstacles which yet lie ahead, so that hereafter it may be said that nothing was concealed from the people of the Philippine Islands. America, I am sure, will consider seriously in the future any proposal you may suggest, incident to independence, which will conduce to the welfare of the people of both countries.

Through the medium of open covenants openly arrived at, our union will be dissolved in an atmosphere of friendship and mutual understanding, to the end that, after independence, we may continue to carve out our separate destinies, still joined by the golden ties of mutual regard and good wishes one for the other. On behalf of my associates of the Mission and myself, may I publicly thank you all for your hospitality, your helpfulness, and kindness, and wish you Godspeed.

THE PRESIDENT'S DEFENSE OF THE FARM PROGRAM

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President—

Mr. WAGNER. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I dare intrude myself upon the able Senator from New York to state that his address will be one of profound information to us; but I depart from its object to remind my brother Senators that the President of the United States is to be congratulated—relying upon the reports of the public press—for having, in his speech to the farmers' delegation, used what Emerson, treating of Shakespeare, describes as "the commanding word."

We read that the President of the United States bravely asserted to an aggregation of gentlemen visiting him in the White House, who are the representatives of farming interests, that there had been those throughout this country who, when alluding to the policies of the present administration and legislation generally, had been guilty of lying.

Sir, we note with gleeful satisfaction that by whatever soft name heretofore, out of consideration to policies noblesse, he had designated such utterances, the time had now come to give them their proper apothegm. They were lies and propagated by liars.

Mr. President, it is the history of legislation—it has ever been so with us, who recognize and remember our own experiences, and I refer to our honorable friends on all sides and both sides of the Senate and all legislators—that a class of individuals, busy projecting before the public and the country what they deem to be the content of a legislative measure and its purposes, usually indulge in the prophecy of sure destruction upon the property of the citizen and all the rights of American mankind.

Mr. President, Shakespeare has placed an observation in the mouth of one of his great players that "half a truth is worse than a whole lie"; and we on both sides of this Chamber, and I am sure the other honorable House, have been made the victim of such misrepresentations, not intentionally, let us believe, by some, but deliberately repeated and multiplied for deliberate uses and purposes by others who with considered object deceive those anxious over the subject. The President may not have been so polite last night in his strong characterization as under ordinary conditions has been his expression. He arose to the height where he adopted the words that the fourth estate, the representatives of Mercury in the press gallery, have heretofore labeled the "short and ugly word." In the use by the President he applied the appropriate one under the circumstances.

I pause to give, in the moment I am seizing from the eminent Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], one or two illustrations.

A certain class of men calling themselves financiers, in order to give themselves a respectable attitude and robe themselves with a commercial righteousness, have been publishing in the New York newspapers that this country is on its way to sure inflation, a course that is to destroy the credit of the Nation, rob all securities of their value, and reduce the worth of the Liberty bonds of the country to nothingness. They advertise in the public press that since we are on the eve of doing such infamy and will surely accomplish that fiendish purpose upon the Republic, they tender to the holders of the American Liberty bonds the opportunity to come into their office—"says the spider to the fly" [laughter]—and exchange their Liberty bonds, soon to be "debased", "discredited", and destroyed for valuable "securities", worthy and valuable and which will, of course, float to fortune those destined to unhappy fate and misfortune from inflation. It is asked that the possessors of the Government bonds exchange the Liberty bonds of their Government, securities which are soon to be destroyed by inflation, for the very secure and worthy "securities" which are to be tendered as exchange value by these gentlemen and their representatives.

Mr. President, let us recall that these advertisers of fraudulent seductions are of a kind with those who had been putting upon the people, in a period not long since and not altogether forgotten, a class of other "securities" that robbed the widow of her very last pittance, the child of his inheritance, the man of his possessions, and the Nation of all its credit and honor.

These and their kind are they as portrayed by Aesop, telling how the fox said to the farmer, "Leave to us the chickens to care for—chickens are our specialty." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, these liars for 2 years have been charging that this Republic was on the eve of inflation; that our Nation is now about to follow the steps of Germany, and soon to yield to the financial destruction which surely will follow. This is asserted as penalty if our Government attempts any course whatever that runs against the trickery that accumulated vast profits through robbing the helpless and cheating the defenseless and the ignorant. These slanderers continuously multiplied these charges as to what this Republic is about to do that is to wreck its own people. It is now charged that Mr. Morgenthau, the Secretary of the Treasury, is to put a bomb under the gold deposits of the United States. He is to melt up its metal, burn up its securities, and leave the country in a condition where its house is destroyed and its children left perishing, bereft of hope and of a life of prosperity—all this intimated as ordered financial holocaust, to be brought about by our Government officials.

I congratulate the President of the United States that he has now found it agreeable to come out of that closet from which, of course, his office impelled upon him—that great courtesy, smiling indulgences, and sometimes too great deference. He has most timely yielded to the proper impulse to call these liars who slander their Government and misrepresent the legislative bodies of this country, that which they are, "deliberate liars."

We come to two illustrations.

There comes to us the intimation and charge that there is a labor bill, designated by the name of the distinguished proponent of the bill, the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], and that by this we are on the eve—say these telegrams arriving this morning—of surrendering the Government to what are branded as "labor unions." The President is to abdicate his office, the legislature is to surrender its province, all business is to be sacrificed to its confiscation, finance discredited, all honor of the Nation yielded to terror, and everything in the Republic which gives it distinction before the world surrendered to discredit and disgrace. All this in obedience to the command of those who are to impose anarchy on the one hand, bolshevism all around, and destruction universal to American citizenship.

In the Holy Scriptures somewhere, through the mouth of one of the prophets, the observation is made, "All men are liars." Well applicable indeed it is to those who continue to pass their condemnations, if you please, and their maledictions upon anything that issues out of a legislative chamber.

And now another illustration, sir:

It is said that there is a legislative measure, called "an agricultural bill", by which we are to repose in the Secretary of one of the departments the power to sit in judgment as to when law of action is violated and the offender deprived of privilege to continue his offenses. It is cried out that such provision is tyranny, violation of liberty, where the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to sit in judgment to decide who are the offenders against certain regulations and to suggest a form of punishment which can take from those who are now enjoying the privilege the continuous right to violate the law, cheat the farmer in the country, and rob the citizen of the city.

It is heralded that this provision of authority is unprecedented, is an unparalleled power put in the hands of this officer of Government—that this new endowment is a dishonor to the Nation, a discredit to the citizen, and a destruction of liberty. Ah, these "gents" who have been making these observations! I use the word "gents" because it fits the character of those individuals who scream their "indignation." They deserve just such characterization, those who fittingly, if there is anything gentle in them at all, never rise any higher than "gents." The word "gent" oftentimes means the same as the Latin "gentium", the lowest order of protoplasmic propagated humanity. [Laughter.]

Now, may it please you, sir, and my eminent colleagues on the other side, I say that this provision now carried into the new agricultural bill is taken out of an agricultural law 35 years old, copied, if you please, without the change of a comma or the crossing of a "t", all in order that the new provision should be wholly within the language of the law of similar wording heretofore passed on by the Supreme Court of the United States, held by the Court legal and constitutional. The provision is copied literally from the law which my colleagues will remember as the Oleomargarine Act. By that a highly ranked Republican Congress reposed in the Secretary of the Interior the right to investigate the offender, and, as to the offense, denounce it to the country, and put a form of penalty on the social criminals, depriving them of the right to do business in violation of the law. That, with one or two other agricultural acts of a similar nature, passed on by the eminent brains of the best legislators of both bodies and having the signature of the President of the United States, is in one respect reincorporated. That is the act about which certain of my honorable constituents, of a very high order of intelligence and gentility, send me a wire with that usual ordinance many of my colleagues have received, "Vote against such a bill."

"Why?" There is no reason given.

"For what reason?" None is stated.

"What is wrong about it?" "Do not know."

To be followed up. Why? Because it contains, we are informed, provision for this power in the hands of an official heretofore never so intrusted in a free government.

Who do you think induced this honorable body of citizens to send such a message filled with absurdity and slander? Some one who imposed on them and who knew he was lying, knowing that body of commercial men had not had a chance ever to read the bill, who probably never had seen a line of it, but who could be induced to join in an act of dishonor against the Government because it was at a timely hour to lie against the administration and continue to misrepresent the President, dishonor the legislative body, fill the Nation with despair, strike down every hope of recovery, and in this, dishonor their Nation to the world, all this to the gratification of these malefactors if they could only discredit the administration in the minds of the public of America.

Mr. President, the hour fortunately has come when the President of the United States, in his high station, has found it agreeable, as I remark again, to use the commanding word to characterize these, whoever they are and wherever they are, of whatever party name or designation, who continue to misrepresent their Republic, who continue to misrepresent the United States Congress and pursue the privilege to slander those of the legislators trying to perform their patriotic duty. These the President designates as common liars. To the President our congratulations. The Senate says to him, may his tribe increase and his performance often be multiplied.

I thank my able friend the Senator from New York for yielding a moment to me, as I also thank the Senate.

SETTLEMENT OF LABOR DISPUTES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1958) to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, to diminish the causes of labor disputes, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for amendment, the amendments of the committee to be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, the national labor relations bill does not break with our traditions. It is the next step in the logical unfolding of man's eternal quest for freedom. For 25 centuries of recorded time before the machine age we sought relief from nature's cruel and relentless tyranny. Only 150 years ago did this country cast off the shackles of political despotism. And today, with economic problems occupying the center of the stage, we strive to liberate the common man from destitution, from insecurity, and from human exploitation.

In this modern aspect of a time-worn problem the isolated worker is a plaything of fate. Caught in the labyrinth of modern industrialism and dwarfed by the size of corporate enterprise, he can attain freedom and dignity only by co-operation with others of his group. This truism has been paid at least the lip service of universal opinion. It is on the page of every treatise and in the platform of every political party.

LEGAL BACKGROUND: THE ANTITRUST LAWS AND THE LABOR INJUNCTION

In fact, this simple idea has become so embedded in our habits of thought that we find it difficult to realize that only a little over a century ago our law denied workers the right to combine for the purpose of raising wages. In the Philadelphia Cordwainer's case, decided in 1806 (Common and Gilmore, Doc. Hist., vol. 3, pp. 59-249), it was said of such a combination:

This measure is pregnant with public mischief and private injury . . . tends to demoralize the workmen . . . destroy the trade of the city, and leaves the pockets of the whole community to the discretion of the concerned. If these evils were unprovided for by the law now existing, it would be necessary that laws should be made to restrain them.

Fortunately, it was not long before the law became more sensitive to life. The cornerstone of industrial liberty was laid in Massachusetts in 1842 by the great Chief Justice Shaw. In Commonwealth v. Hunt (4 Metcalf 111) he said:

We think, therefore, that associations may be entered into . . . and yet so far from being criminal or unlawful, the object may be highly meritorious and public spirited.

The classic modern statement was written by Chief Justice Taft in American Steel Foundry v. The Tri-City Central Trades Council (257 U. S. 184 (1921)). In that opinion trade unions received the following encomium:

They were organized out of the necessities of the situation. A single employee was helpless in dealing with an employer. He was dependent ordinarily upon his daily wage for the maintenance of himself and family. If the employer refused to pay him the wages that he thought fair, he was, nevertheless, unable to leave the employ and to resist arbitrary and unfair treatment. Union was essential to give laborers opportunity to deal on equality with their employers.

As the increasing mechanization of industry and the flowering of the factory system built up larger and larger aggregates of capital, it became obvious that our cherished equality of opportunity could not be maintained merely by pious declarations or abstract guaranties of freedom. By the second half of the nineteenth century, the active intervention of the Government was necessary to prevent economic concentration from fostering economic despotism. In consequence, the year 1890 witnessed the enactment of the Sherman antitrust laws, designed to protect the laborer, the small business man, and the consumer from the power of combination and the greed of monopoly.

It is not my intent to debate at this time why the antitrust laws withered under sustained assault in the courts. Whether it was due to the formidable battery of lawyers that the powerful could gather, or to the subconscious prejudices that judges carried over from their former associations, or to the fact that the laws themselves were not in harmony with the technique of modern industry are matters of relatively little moment today. The important fact is that the laws failed.

In the very first prosecution which came before the Supreme Court, United States v. E. C. Knight & Co. (156 U. S. 1 (1894)), it was held that a combination embracing 98 percent of the sugar-refinery capacity of the country was not in restraint of trade because manufacturing was not commerce. This decision, based upon Webster's dictionary rather than upon economic reality, practically inhibited further action by the Government for a decade and created the impression that combines of industrial concerns were virtually impregnable.

Hope for the vindication of the law rose in 1911, when the Court ordered the dissolution of the Standard Oil Co., Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey v. United States (221 U. S. 1).

But the rule of reason enunciated in that famous case soon became a vehicle for substituting the economic opinions of the Court for the expressed policy of Congress. The copious expansiveness of the rule was portended in United States v. United States Steel Corporation (251 U. S. 417 (1920)). In writing the opinion of the Court which sanctioned that combine, Mr. Justice McKenna said:

The power attained was much greater than that possessed by any one competitor. It was not greater than that possessed by all of them.

Thus it was held in effect that a monster combination which controlled from 40 to 50 percent of the steel industry was not in violation of the public interest, since its holdings did not exceed those of all of its competitors. It was overlooked that a scattered field of small rivals might be completely overridden by a single adversary representing even 40 percent of the total national strength.

The Steel case was followed closely by United Shoe Machinery Corporation v. United States (258 U. S. 451 (1922)), which upheld restrictive tying clauses enabling one corporation to control more than 95 percent of the shoe-machinery business of the country. But the final quietus to the antitrust laws was given in United States v. International Harvester Co. (74 U. S. 693 (1926)). Here the Court elaborated its fine distinction between good and bad trusts, and said:

The law, however, does not make the mere size of a corporation, however impressive, or the existence of unexercised power on its part, an offense, when unaccompanied by unlawful conduct in the exercise of its power.

Thus the heavy hand of the courts paralyzed the enforcement of the antitrust laws. During the 40 years after their enactment an average of one person per year was imprisoned for violating their criminal sections, while only about $2,000,000 in fines were collected. Under the provisions for confiscation of goods shipped in interstate commerce by concerns violating the law, only 40 cartons of cigarettes were seized, and these were returned. Walton H. Hamilton, a distinguished economist and lawyer, who has made extensive studies on this subject, testified before the Senate Committee on Finance last month:

In terms of its formal administration the number of cases is pitiful, the amount of fines assessed is pitiful, the number of people sent to jail for violation of this law is almost negligible as against the great course of the concentration of wealth which has occurred in this country in the last generation and a half.

When the final history of our times comes to be written, its most glaring paradox will be the manner in which the antitrust laws were swerved from the course marked out by Congress and were invoked to harass the activities of those very groups they had been designed to protect. It is interesting to note that another famous Federal statute, also enacted for the protection of the weak, was used even sooner in a manner foreshadowing future events. In the case of Toledo A. & N. M. Railway Co. v. Pennsylvania Co. (54 Fed. 730 (1893)), Judge Taft, later to become Chief Justice of the United States, held that under the Interstate Commerce Act of 1887 the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers could be enjoined from ordering employees to refuse to handle freight cars during the course of a strike. But the further extension of that act to the labor field was checked by the advent of the Sherman law.

Beginning in 1893, the lower Federal courts applied the antitrust laws regularly to the activities of labor organizations. This procedure was first sustained by the Supreme Court in the case of Loewe v. Lawlor (208 U. S. 274 (1908)), where it was said that Congress "made the interdictions include combinations of labor as well as of capital." This Danbury Hatters case, it is true, involved activities which were clearly interstate in their ramifications and powerful in their effects. But in short order notice was served of the meticulous exactitude with which the actions of employees were to be surveyed. Thus in Gompers v. Buck Stove & Range (221 U. S. 418 (1911)), the Supreme Court said that the antitrust laws prohibited restraints whether occasioned "by blacklist, boycott, coercion, threat, intimidation, and whether these be made effective, in whole or in part, by act, words, or printed matter." Meanwhile the lower courts maintained their vigilance. Although peaceful picketing had come to be recognized as a legitimate and necessary incident to collective bargaining, the case of Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. v. Gee (139 Fed. 582 (1905)) held that "there is and can be no such thing as peaceful picketing, any more than there can be chaste vulgarity or peaceful mobbing or lawful lynching." Certainly the rule of reason did not smile upon the aspirations of working people.

Vexed by the double frustration of its intent, an awakened Congress in 1914 passed the Clayton Act, declaring that labor organizations should be allowed to pursue their lawful and legitimate objectives, and that no injunction should be issued in a dispute between an employer and employees except when necessary to prevent irreparable injury.

But captious verbalisms by the Court soon rendered the Clayton Act as ineffectual as its predecessors. In Duplex Printing Press v. Deering (254 U. S. 443 (1921)), upholding an injunction against a secondary boycott by employees, Mr. Justice Pitney argued that Congress, in excluding from the provisions of the antitrust laws all lawful activities of labor organizations, had intended to exclude only those acts which had theretofore been lawful under the antitrust laws. This highly elliptical reasoning was reiterated in American Steel Foundry v. The Tri-City Central Trades Council, supra, declaring that the Clayton Act "introduced no new principle into the equity jurisprudence of those courts. It is merely declaratory of what was the best practice always."

Ironically enough, it was cases after the passage of the Clayton Act that marked the high-water mark of judicial hostility to labor organizations. In the Tri-City case an employee organization was denied the right to place more than one peaceful picket near the entrance to a building, and the Court added that "the name picket indicated a militant purpose, inconsistent with peaceful persuasion." In Bedford Cut Stone Co. v. Journeymen Stone Cutters Association (275 U. S. 37 (1927)) the issue was whether a small group of craftsmen might refuse to work upon stone shipped into the State from quarries in another State where non-union labor was employed. A secondary boycott had already been declared legal by high courts in New York and California. Bossert v. Dhuy (221 N. Y. 342 (1917)) and Pierce v. Stablemen's Union (156 Calif. 70 (1909)). But the Supreme Court found a violation of the antitrust laws and sustained an injunction. The voice of Mr. Justice Brandeis was heard in protest:

The Sherman law was held, in United States v. The United States Steel Corporation, to permit capitalists to combine in a single corporation 50 percent of the steel industry of the United States, dominating the trade through its vast resources. The Sherman law was held, in United States v. The United Shoe Machinery Co., to permit competitors to combine in another corporation practically the whole shoe-machinery industry of the country, necessarily giving a position of dominance over shoe manufacturing in America. It would, indeed, be strange if Congress had by the same action willed to deny to members of a small class of workmen the right to cooperate in simply refraining from work, when that course was the only means of self-protection against a combination of militant and powerful employers.

While the courts were thus turning the heavy batteries of the antitrust laws against the activities of employees, they were spiking the statutes that Congress and the States framed expressly to protect these groups. In Truax v. Corrigan (257 U. S. 312 (1922)), an Arizona statute forbidding the issuance of a labor injunction except to prevent irreparable injury was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. Mr. Justice Brandeis, accompanied by Justices Holmes and Pitney, dissented in the following language:

It was urged that the real motive in seeking the injunction was not ordinarily to prevent property from being injured nor to protect the owner in its use, but to endow property with active, militant power which would make it dominant over men. In other words, that under the guise of protecting property rights, the employer was seeking sovereign power.

In Adair v. United States (208 U. S. 161 (1907)), over the dissents of Mr. Justice Holmes and Mr. Justice McKenna, a statute seeking to outlaw the "yellow dog" contract was declared unconstitutional. Seven years later, when the State of Kansas tried to achieve the same result, it was thwarted by Coppage v. Kansas (236 U. S. 1 (1914)). It was in the latter case that Mr. Justice Holmes supported Justice Day and the then Associate Justice Hughes in saying:

In present conditions a workman not unnaturally may believe that only by belonging to a union can he secure a contract that shall be fair to him. * * * If that belief, whether right or wrong, may be held by a reasonable man, it seems to me that it may be enforced by law in order to establish the equality of position between the parties in which liberty of contract begins.

ECONOMIC BACKGROUND: INDUSTRIAL CONCENTRATION AND THE DEPRESSION

These cases which I have cited are not mere records of mock trials in moot courts. They are the external evidence of sweeping political and economic developments completely out of line with our professed desires to make opportunity equally available to all.

The fragile resistance of the antitrust laws did nothing to prevent the compounding of business into larger and larger units. In 1909 there was one small enterprise or manufacturing establishment for every 250 people in the Nation; by 1929 there was only one for every 900 people. In 1904, over 50 percent of the manufacturers in the United States were small enterprisers, each producing less than $20,000 worth of goods per year. By 1929, these small enterprisers had shrunk in number to 32 percent of the total. During the same span of time, producers of goods valued at $100,000 or more per year rose from 16.9 percent of the total to 31.5 percent. And while only one-quarter of the workers in America were employed by million-dollar-a-year concerns in 1904, about three-fifths of the workers were employed by such concerns in 1929.

These technological changes doubled the productive capacity of the average worker between 1919 and 1933. In manufacturing alone, they increased his hourly product by 71 percent. They opened up new vistas of comfort and security to the average man. But despite reassuring discourse about profit sharing and employee participation in industry, the increasing size of business brought concentration of wealth in geometric ratio. By 1929, 200 huge corporations owned one-half of our total corporate wealth. Two years later, 100 general industrial corporations out of a total of 300,000 controlled one-third of the general industrial wealth of the Nation. As a natural corollary, the wage earners' share in the product created by manufacturing has declined steadily for nearly a century. Standing at 51 percent in 1849, it fell to 42 percent in 1919 and to 36 percent in 1933. The isolation of the individual worker has been reflected glaringly in the distribution of the Nation's goods.

The tremendous disparity between the few and the many became most pronounced in that glittering era which we regarded as the zenith of American prosperity. Between 1922 and 1929 the real wages of employees increased by slightly less than 10 percent. But during the same period industrial profits rose by 86 percent, while in the shorter span from 1926 to 1929 dividend payments mounted by 104 percent.

If we had succeeded in providing the minimum requirements of health and decency for every deserving person in the United States, we might have said that the maldistribution of income was a fair price to pay for our industrial efficiency. But we know that we suffered from the prevalence of poverty in a land of plenty. In 1929, 6,000,000 families, or more than 21 percent of our total population, had incomes of less than $1,000 per year. About 12,000,000 families, or more than 42 percent of the total, earned less than $1,500 yearly. Sixteen million families, or 60 percent of the people, had annual incomes below the $2,000 per year necessary for the basic requirements of health and decency. And nearly 20,000,000 families, constituting 71 percent of all America, received less than $2,500 a year. At the same time, in the highest income bracket, one-tenth of 1 percent of the families in the United States were earning as much as the 42 percent at the bottom. It is not surprising that in America's Capacity to Consume, the most complete study of family income ever presented to the general reader in this country, the statement is made without equivocation that during the past decade "inequality in the distribution of income has been accentuated."

Not only the preachments of moralists but also the teachings of economists have proved that this injustice wrought its hardships upon those who were temporarily favored as well as those who had been permanently neglected. The low level of income prevented the vast majority of consumers from draining the market of its flood of goods. This was particularly serious in an age of mass production, which had built 21,000,000 automobiles and over 20,000,000 radio sets. At the same time, the extraordinary concentration of income placed excessive savings in the hands of a few. While 60 percent of the families in America contributed only 1.6 percent to the total savings of the country, 2.3 percent of all families contributed 66½ percent to all savings, and 60,000 families at the top of the economic ladder saved almost as much as 25,000,000 families on the lower rungs. Corporate surpluses rose from $8,500,000,000 in 1923 to $16,000,000,000 in 1929. These accumulations of the few sought outlet through investments in plant facilities. Contrasted with the 10-percent rise in wages between 1922 and 1929, the production of machinery increased 91 percent and of capital equipment 70 percent. Production mounted beyond any possibilities of market absorption.

For a short while we staved off inevitable disaster by the pipe dream of installment selling and by lending Europe money with which to buy our own products. But when the domestic market finally closed to further investment, and foreign trade collapsed because our own people had no money with which to buy European goods, the crash came.

This thesis, which places the failure of purchasing power at the center of all explanations of depression, has long received recognition. It has been further substantiated this year in a stimulating book entitled The Formation of Capital, by Dr. H. G. Moulton. This volume states:

The base of the economic pyramid is the production of consumption goods. The demand for plant and equipment is derived from the demand for consumption goods * * * A slight shrinkage at the base of the pyramid very nearly eliminates the top * * * The primary need is a larger flow of funds through consumptive channels.

During 4 long years after the depression came we clung to the same policies which had brought the calamity and which were prolonging its ravages. While the level of wages dropped 60 percent between 1929 and 1932, property income fell only 29 percent. The remarkable report of the Research and Planning Division of the National Recovery Administration shows that while wages stood at 44 percent of the 1926 level in 1932, and the national income at only 62 percent of that level, dividend payments remained as high as 142 percent of that level. And day by day the downward spiral gained in momentum.

POLICY OF THE RECOVERY PROGRAM AND SECTION 7 (A) OF THE N. I. R. A.

It was only when over 15,000,000 people were unemployed, when banks were closed, when business was uprooted, and when our whole economic system hung perilously on the precipice, that we embarked upon a new program. This new program was projected in terms of recovery and reform. It was designated not merely to set the forces of revival in motion, but, above all, to eradicate permanently the evils that had done so much harm in the past.

The first hypothesis was that the interpenetration of all industries throughout the country, the nonconformity of economic organization to State lines, and the deep-seated and wide-spread character of the national calamity, made Nation-wide action essential. For the purpose of rationalizing production, outlawing cutthroat competition, and bringing order into the distribution of goods, not only were the antitrust laws in part suspended but the Government itself embarked upon the diametrically opposed policy of stimulating coast-to-coast cooperation among business men. It was thought that in this manner a permanent equilibrium of the various factors in industry might be maintained.

In addition, there was a second phase of the program which struck at the very core of the depression. Congress determined to fix wages and hours at a level that might, by reemployment and higher pay, spread adequate purchasing power among the masses of consumers and thus prime the pump of business. Equally in the foreground was the intent to insure a decent measure of security and comfort to those who worked, while protecting the fair-minded employer from the cutthroat tactics of the exploiting few.

But the Government never for a moment proposed to set up a benevolent despotism, or to extend its arm into every nook and cranny of private business. It did not contemplate regulation of every scale of wages or supervision of every schedule of hours. Acting in an emergency, it desired only to create a solid foundation upon which might be built the mutual efforts of a revived industry and a rehabilitated labor. And if industry and labor were to act in unison, it was clear that they would need equal opportunities for intelligent and effective action. Just as industry was organized, so labor was to be allowed to organize. It was for this purpose that section 7 (a) was written into the National Industrial Recovery Act and reinforced last June by Public Resolution No. 44, providing for the election of representatives for the purpose of collective bargaining.

I think it may be safely said that whatever controversy now rages as to the wisdom of many phases of the recovery program, and of the National Industrial Recovery Act in particular, there is practically unanimous agreement in Congress that section 7 (a) was sound in inception, and that the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing should be safeguarded at all times. If Congress recognized that right for decades, Congress must shoulder the responsibility to protect it now that employers are more united than ever before in trade associations blanketing the entire country. The developments of the past two years have not given employees any guaranties to which they were not entitled. But the events of the past two years have intensified the social necessity of protecting these guaranties against repudiation.

THE BREAK-DOWN OF SECTION 7 (A) AND ITS ECONOMIC CONSEQUENCES

Nor is there any disagreement about the fact that section 7 (a) has collapsed. General Johnson, the first Administrator of the National Industrial Recovery Act, in testifying last month before the Finance Committee of the Senate, said:

I think section 7 (a) has substantially failed of its original purpose.

Mr. Francis Biddle, the brilliant Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, on the same occasion referred to "the emptiness of a law which we know cannot be enforced." A very recent and exceedingly comprehensive study of the National Recovery Administration by the Brookings Institution says:

Section 7 of the Recovery Act is uncertain in purpose, vague in contents, and ambiguous in language.

This break-down of section 7 (a) has driven a dagger close to the heart of the recovery program. It was intended that the codes should be formulated with the "united action of labor and management." But with labor denied the opportunity to organize and bargain collectively, practically all of the codes have been conceived and drafted and presented for governmental approval by employers alone. This means that in the original formulation of the labor provisions no less than the trade practices, industry wrote the ticket. Labor came into the picture, not as the genuine party in interest that it should have been, but merely through the indirect representation of the Labor Advisory Board, an organ with no actual authority and with no bargaining power comparable to that of the trade associations.

The results of this defect are well illustrated by the difference between the normal run of codes and the few special codes formed by a process of collective bargaining. The normal codes usually provide a 40-hour week, while the special codes descend frequently to a 36- or 35-hour week. The special codes, such as in the coal, needle, and building trades, provide fairly scientific minimum-wage levels for the various skills, while the normal codes are generally filled with vague and uncertain exemptions and exceptions which make enforcement difficult and remove much of the legal force from the minimum-wage rates.

One specific example is particularly telling. The tobacco industry is one of the most profitable in the country; but since it has allowed collective bargaining no place, the increase in the average weekly wage between 1933 and 1934 was only 75 cents. But in the women's clothing industry, where section 7 (a) has been an actuality, the advance in pay was $3. The average weekly earnings during the last year in the cigarette trade were $11.84; in the women's clothing trade $18.82.

The cumulative effects of these shortcomings are reflected in economic tendencies at the present time. Unemployment is as great as it was a year ago. Average weekly hours of work, which stood at 37¼ when the codes were established in the fall of 1933, stand at 37½ today. The real income of the individual worker employed full time is less than in March 1933. The average worker's income in 1934 was $1,099, or $813 less than the amount required to maintain a family of five in health and decency. The realignment of profits and wages, which we contemplated so confidently in the spring of 1933, has not taken place.

In December 1934, pay rolls registered only 60 percent of the 1926 level, while dividend and interest payments were fixed at 150 percent of that level. Total wages have risen only 28 percent in the past 2 years, while 840 large companies have increased their profits from $471,000,000 in 1933 to $673,000,000 in 1934, a gain of 42 percent. Net profits of 1,435 manufacturing and trading companies increased from $640,000,000 in 1933 to $1,071,000,000 in 1934, or 64 percent, while their annual rate of return rose from 2.7 percent to 4.5 percent.

Furthermore, the history of the past 2 years makes it clear that failure to maintain a sane balance between wages and industrial returns will be attended by the same fatal consequences as in the past. The rise of business activity to 89 percent of normal in the precode booms of April and July 1933 collapsed after July because no adequate purchasing power had been built up to sustain it. The rise to 80 percent of normal in April and May 1934 rested on a surer foundation because of the increase in purchasing power provided through reemployment in the fall of 1933 and through public spending.

If the more recent quickening of business activity is not supported by rises in wages, either we shall have to sustain the market indefinitely by huge and continuous public spending or we shall meet the certainty of another collapse. With the evil and the remedy in such clear relief, Congress cannot hesitate to atone the error of allowing section 7 (a) to languish.

WEAKNESSES IN THE PRESENT LAW REGARDING COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

A study of the weaknesses in the existing law brings the conviction that the remedy is neither obscure nor unattainable. The patent ambiguity and excessive generality of section 7 (a) has led to a proliferation of interpretations and counterinterpretations. Consequently both employers and employees have been denied their basic right to a clear and certain law.

Turning at once from substance to procedure, the greatest difficulty with section 7 (a) has been that the present National Labor Relations Board, the cardinal agency for interpreting it, has not been vested with enforcement powers. The Board, after hearing cases, may refer them with recommendations to the National Recovery Administration. As was demonstrated in the recent Colt case, it is that administration rather than the Board which exercises final discretion in determining whether the Blue Eagle shall be removed or whether Government contracts shall be canceled.

Of course, the National Recovery Administration has adequate enforcement powers. But everyone knows that the whole tendency of that organization has been toward conciliation and compromise with industry in order that codes of fair competition may be administered smoothly and continuously. This approach may be laudable in dealing with standards of fair competition that have been written and proposed by industry itself. But it is totally unsuited to the enforcement of section 7 (a), which is a mandate of Congress, which becomes a crucial issue in those very cases where it is most flagrantly challenged, and which, like all analogous laws of Congress, must be vindicated by a judicial process. The confusion of the voluntarily submitted fair-practice provisions with section 7 (a) has put the Recovery Administration in the untenable position of conciliator and prosecutor at once. Not only has section 7 (a) been lost in the shuffle but the Recovery Administration itself has suffered from the misplaced burden. And this difficulty has been aggravated because, under present conditions, section 7 (a) is applicable only where there is a code of fair competition, which constantly puts recalcitrants in the position where they can threaten to surrender their codes in case section 7 (a) is enforced against them.

As an alternative, the present National Labor Relations Board may refer its recommendations to the Department of Justice for enforcement. But since the Board has no power of subpoena or investigation except in connection with elections, the records which it builds up are based in most cases upon the testimony of complainants alone, supplemented at best by the testimony of such witnesses as the defendant voluntarily presents. This makes it necessary for the Department of Justice in any event to make further investigations before bringing suit; and if the Department brings suit at all, it must commence entirely de novo in the courts, with the defendant having 30 days to answer, or moving to dismiss, or applying for a bill of particulars. Thus is defeated the very purpose of an administrative agency, which is to provide specialized treatment of the factual aspects of a specialized controversy.

Weak as it is, the present National Labor Relations Board has been subjected, in addition, to the corroding influence of various industrial boards, dealing according to their own lights with the same subject matter. At present from 13 to 15 boards have been established to handle 7 (a) cases, and over none of these has the national board jurisdiction, either as to fact or as to law. Since there are now over 100 codes which provide for the establishment of industrial boards, there exists the constant threat that dispersion of authority will transcend all reasonable bounds.

Quite aside from all question of scattered responsibility, these industrial boards are essentially unsuited to the handling of 7 (a) cases. Partisan in composition, living in an atmosphere of compromise and conciliation, they are well designed to adjust wage and hour controversies in accordance with the varying standards of different localities. The success of labor before an industrial board depends upon the strength of labor in that particular area. But section 7 (a) was written by Congress to protect the weak who could not protect themselves, and it was intended for universal application, not universal modification. The major effect of leaving its enforcement to a variety of industrial boards is to give the least protection to those who need it most.

Last June, in order to remedy the recognized weaknesses in section 7 (a), Congress passed Public Resolution No. 44. The main purpose of that resolution was to facilitate the holding of elections by the National Labor Relations Board; but a fatal loophole has rendered its effect nugatory. In providing that election orders of the Board might be reviewed in the courts prior to the holding of the election itself, the law afforded employers a shield to ward off action indefinitely. The most revealing commentary upon the joint resolution is contained in a letter disclosed by the Senate committee investigating munitions. Written last June by a vice president of one of America's largest corporations, it says:

My guess is that Congress will today pass the joint resolution proposed as an alternative to the Wagner bill, and that will end, for the time being, at least, many of our troubles in that respect. Personally, I view the passage of the joint resolution with equanimity. It means that temporary measures, which cannot last more than a year, will be substituted for the permanent legislation proposed in the original Wagner bill. I do not believe that there will again be as good a chance for the passage of the Wagner Act as exists now, and the trade is a mighty good compromise.

I have read carefully the joint resolution, and my personal opinion is that it is not going to bother us very much. For one thing, it would be necessary, if the newly created boards are to order and supervise elections in our plants, that they first set aside as invalid the elections just completed.

I do not think this can be done. If, in 1935, our elections should occur in the second half of June rather than in the first half, the board would automatically be legislated out of existence before that date.

If they try to horn in on us in any situation in the meantime, I think we have our fences pretty securely set up. Therefore, and for other reasons, I am in favor of compromising by not opposing passage of the joint resolution. This, of course, is my own personal opinion. I have not yet had a chance to clear it with our people here.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BILL—ENFORCEMENT PROVISIONS

The present bill cures the defects in existing law. It clarifies and amplifies the provisions of section 7 (a), and it centralizes in a single permanent National Labor Relations Board the duty to protect the collective-bargaining rights of employees. The Board will, of course, have regional agencies throughout the country to handle violations initially at their source, and will be empowered to designate any existing industrial board for such purposes. In all cases, however, the findings and recommendations of these agencies will be transferred to the National Labor Relations Board for final action. After these appropriate hearings the Board will be empowered to issue orders forbidding violations of the law and making restitution to those who have been injured thereby. All such orders will be fully reviewable at the instance of any aggrieved party in the Federal courts.

The procedure set forth in this bill is so closely modeled upon other statutes, such as the Federal Trade Commission Act and the Interstate Commerce Act, that one is astounded to hear the charges circulated to the effect that this measure would sweep aside the courts and endow a new and queer kind of agency with dictatorial or arbitrary powers.

The power of the Board to hold elections is considerably clarified. An election is merely a preliminary determination of fact. There is no more reason why it should be subject to anterior court review than why a hearing should be deferred pending judicial action; but if any election is made the basis for an order of the Board related to an unfair labor practice, the whole procedure embracing the election will be fully reviewable in the appropriate Federal court.

UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Let us turn now to the substantive provisions of the bill dealing with unfair labor practices. I wish to emphasize at the outset how limited these provisions are in their scope, how simple they are in their language, and how thoroughly they are grounded in long-established congressional policy.

The first unfair-labor-practice provision, in substance, forbids an employer to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of their right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

This language follows practically verbatim the familiar principles already embedded in our law by section 2 of the Railway Labor Act of 1926, section 2 of the Norris-LaGuardia Act, section 77 (p) and (q) of 1932 amendments to the Bankruptcy Act, section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act, and section 7 (e) of the act creating the office of the Federal Coordinator of Transportation.

Experience over a considerable period of time, however, has made it clear that these general declarations of freedom have little effect unless they are accomplished by a specific catalog of forbidden practices. Therefore, the succeeding four unfair-labor-practice provisions, without narrowing in any way the widest possible application of the first, enunciate with particularity the concrete acts which have been the most fertile source of trouble in the past.

THE PROBLEM OF THE COMPANY UNION

The second unfair-labor-practice provision deals with the so-called "company-union problem." It makes it unlawful for an employer to dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of any labor organization, or contribute financial or other support to it.

The intent here is to bring about in industry generally the same conditions which Congress decreed for the railways and businesses under trusteeship by the 1933 amendments to the Bankruptcy Act, the act creating the office of the Federal Coordinator of Transportation, and the 1934 amendments to the Railway Labor Act.

Anyone familiar with these laws will recognize at once that there is nothing in the pending bill which promotes a union monopoly, which places the stamp of governmental favor upon any particular type of union, or which outlaws the so-called "company union", if by that term is meant simply an entirely free and independent organization of workers who through their own volition confine their cooperative activities to the limits of one company. Nor is there anything in the bill which interferes with the benefits of pension or recreation plans when such benefits are extended equally to all employees, without discrimination tending to encourage or discourage union membership. The bill intends merely that those agencies designed to represent the workers for purposes of collective bargaining shall be free from the domination or even the interference of the other party.

The primary evil of the organization which is dominated or interfered with by the employer is that, sometimes because of express prohibitions, more often because of its intrinsic composition, it is not well suited to extend its cooperative activities beyond the bounds of a single employer unit. A thorough study of this subject has just been made by the Twentieth Century Fund, backed by an impressive array of scholars, employers, and professional men. It shows that even different company unions of the same employer rarely work in unity, and almost never is there even a loose and informal contact between company unions of different employers.

Limitations such as these run counter to the very core of the new-deal philosophy. Business men are being allowed to pool their information and experience in vast trade associations in order to make a concerted drive against the evil features of modern industrialism. If employees are denied similar privileges, they not only are unable to uphold their end of the labor bargain but, in addition, they cannot cope with any issues that transcend the boundaries of a single business. And under modern industrial conditions problems of wages and hours are regional or even national in scope. Order must exist everywhere if it is to exist at all.

In the second place, the employer who dominates or interferes with his workers sometimes, either by express provisions or more likely by subtle economic pressure, limits his employees' choice of representatives to those who work for him. A worker may be a complete master of his tools, but as a representative he is not an expert in industrial relations, and is likely to be entirely unable to take advantage of legitimate opportunities based upon knowledge of the labor market and general business conditions. More important, only representatives who are not subservient to the employer with whom they deal can act freely in the interest of the workers. Simple common sense tells us that a man does not possess this freedom when he bargains with those who control his source of livelihood.

The third defect of the company-dominated union is that it is supported, in whole or in part, by the employer. I cannot understand how those so well schooled in the doctrines of Americanism can sanction a practice whereby the person on one side of the bargaining table pays the attorney of those with whom he deals. Collective bargaining becomes a mockery when the spokesman of the employee is the marionette of the employer.

These few practices by no means cover the whole range of the abuses that constitute interference. The undue influence which the employer exerts over the supposedly free agent of his workers may take other forms. It may consist in employer interference with the formation of the constitution or bylaws of a labor organization. The essence of interference is that the workers' organization, instead of being absolutely free and independent as an organic entity, is subjected in some way to the employer's will.

The recent study to which I have referred affords ample evidence that the company union is the mere creature of the employer. Out of 125 company unions investigated, the plans for 53 of them were installed by executive order on the part of the employer. Only 22 of them were ratified by a representative vote of the employees. In only 10 cases out of 72 were the employees alone free to change their plan.

The severest indictment of these unions imposed from above is that they have blossomed forth since the passage of the very act which was designed to give workers full freedom of organization. According to the National Industrial Conference Board, the number of workers recruited into company unions rose from 432,000 in 1932 to 1,164,000 in 1933, representing a gain of 169 percent. More than 69 percent of the company unions now in existence have been inaugurated in the brief period since the passage of the Recovery Act.

Contrary to the argument that the company union has the virtue of insuring industrial peace, we know that this open entry of employers into the field of active organization of workers promotes strife and discord. Men versed in the tenets of freedom become restive when not allowed to be free. The sharp outbreaks of economic warfare in various parts of the country to a large extent attest the bitterness of feeling when company unionism raises its head. Most impartial students of industrial problems agree that the best records of mutual accomplishments have been made where the sham union has been driven from the scene, and where workers are free men in fact as well as in name.

PROBLEM OF THE CLOSED SHOP

While outlawing the organization that is interfered with by the employer, this bill does not establish the closed shop or even encourage it. The much-discussed closed-shop proviso merely states that nothing in any Federal law shall be held to legalize the confirmation of voluntary closed-shop agreements between employers and workers. This insertion is necessary to prevent repetition of those mistaken interpretations which have held that Congress intended to outlaw the closed shop when it enacted section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act.

I hold no brief for or against the closed shop, but there are some who believe that it is a device which at times may be necessary to advance and preserve the living standards of employees. It is legal in many States, and there is no reason why Congress should make it illegal in those places where public policy now sustains it.

The virulent propaganda to the effect that this bill encourages the closed shop is outrageous in view of the fact that in two respects it actually narrows the now-existing law in regard to the closed-shop agreement. In the first place, while today an employer may sign a closed-shop contract even with a minority group, the bill provides that he shall be allowed to negotiate such an agreement only with an organization which represents the majority of employees in the appropriate collective bargaining unit covered by such agreement when made. Secondly, the bill is extremely careful to forestall the making of closed-shop agreements with unions that are interfered with or dominated by the company, or with any organization that has been tainted at any time in the past by practices which are now declared to be unfair. The closed-shop agreement is to be allowable only when an organization has been free from its inception.

The third unfair-labor-practice provision makes it illegal for an employer, by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization.

This provision is merely a logical and imperative extension of that section of the Norris-LaGuardia Act which makes the "yellow dog" contract unenforceable in the Federal courts. If freedom of organization is to be preserved, the employees must have more than the knowledge that the courts will not be used to confirm injustice. They need protection most in those very cases where the employer is strong enough to impress his will without the aid of the law. And it is perfectly obvious that unfair pressure may be exercised by discrimination during employment as well as by actual discharge.

The fourth unfair-labor-practice provision, forbidding discharge or discrimination because an employee has filed charges or given testimony under this measure, is self-explanatory.

THE DUTY TO BARGAIN COLLECTIVELY

The final unfair-labor-practice provision makes it illegal for an employer to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees.

Most emphatically this provision does not imply governmental supervision of wage or hour agreements. It does not compel anyone to make a compact of any kind if no terms are arrived at that are satisfactory to him. The very essence of collective bargaining is that either party shall be free to withdraw if its conditions are not met. But the right of workers to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing must be matched by the correlative duty of employers to recognize and deal in good faith with these representatives. The Government itself is held up to ridicule when the elections which it supervises are rendered illusory by failure to acknowledge their results. And needless to say, such a contradictory course generates perpetual discontent and strife.

Just what the duty to bargain collectively implies was clearly set forth by the present National Labor Relations Board in the Houde Engineering Corporation case, decided on August 30, 1934. There the Board said:

Without this duty the right to bargain would be sterile The incontestably sound principle is that the employer is obligated by the statutes to negotiate in good faith with his employee's representatives; to match their proposals, if unacceptable, with counter proposals; and to make every reasonable effort to reach an agreement.

The sound result which the Labor Board reached by interpretation of a vague law should be confirmed and protected by a clear definition of congressional policy.

PRINCIPLE OF MAJORITY RULE

Further to facilitate the procedure of collective bargaining, the bill embraces the principle of majority rule. It states that—

Representatives designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes shall be the exclusive representatives of all employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment.

Collective bargaining is not an artificial procedure devoted to an unknown end. Its object is the making of agreements which will stabilize employment conditions and promote fair working standards. It is well nigh universally recognized that it is practically impossible to apply two or more sets of agreements to one unit of workers at the same time, or to apply the terms of one agreement to only a portion of the workers in a single unit. For this reason, collective bargaining means majority rule. This rule is conducive not only to agreements, but also to friendly relations. Workers find it easier to approach their employers in a spirit of good will if they are not torn by internal dissent. And employers, wherever majority rule has been given a fair chance, have discovered it more profitable to deal with a single group than to be harassed by a constant series of negotiations with rival factions.

Majority rule makes it clear that the guaranty of the right of employees to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing must not be misapplied so as to permit employers to interfere with the practical effectuation of that right by bargaining with individuals or minority groups in their own behalf after representatives have been picked by the majority to represent all.

At the same time, majority rule recognizes minority rights. It does not ever imply that any employee can be forced to join a union, except through the traditional method of a closed-shop agreement with the employer. And since, in the absence of such an agreement, the bill specifically prevents discrimination against anyone either for belonging or for not belonging to a union, the majority will be quite powerless to make an agreement more favorable to themselves than to the minority who remain without. In addition, the bill preserves the right of any individual or minority group to present grievances to its employer.

Anyone who analyzes the problems and who studies the history of industrial relations will be amazed at the current opposition to majority rule. Certainly it cannot be claimed that the rule is lacking solid precedent. It has been applied regularly by governmental agencies and recognized repeatedly by laws of Congress. It was followed by the National War Labor Board created by President Wilson in the spring of 1918. It has been applied consistently by the Railway Labor Board created by the Transportation Act of 1920. The 1934 amendments to the Railway Labor Act provided for it. Public Resolution No. 44, approved last June, in that it provided for elections, must have contemplated majority rule.

If we turn from governmental experience to private practice, what do we find? The platform adopted by the Congress of American Industry and the National Association of Manufacturers on December 5 and 6, 1934, and they are the ones who now oppose majority rule for workers, provides:

Under appropriate safeguards, the approved competitive practices and prohibitions submitted by the properly defined majority of a group, trade, or industry shall be binding upon the minority.

The experience of the National Labor Relations Board has been that the very employers who decry majority rule today insisted upon majority rule alone when they were in control of the situation through their dominance over a company union. The animus behind the crocodile tears now being shed for the welfare of minorities was laid bare by the liberal dean of the Wisconsin Law School, Lloyd K. Garrison, a former Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board. Testifying before the Committee on Education and Labor upon this bill, he said:

It seemed to me last summer, as I sat on the Board and listened to these cases, quite evident that the opposition to this rule came down simply to this, that the employer who opposed the rule merely wanted to avoid doing any collective bargaining at all so long as he could keep his responsibility diffused. So long as he could say, "I will bargain first with this group, then I will bargain with that group, and then I will run back to the first and see what they think about the proposals", and so on ad infinitum, he would end up by reaching no collective agreement at all. And that is why the majority rule is opposed.

Mr. Garrison has placed the matter in a nutshell. He has made it clear that democracy in industry must be based upon the same principles as democracy in government. Majority rule, with all its imperfections, is the best protection of workers' rights, just as it is the surest guaranty of political liberty that mankind has yet discovered.

CONSTITUTIONALITY

It is appropriate that some reference should be made to the constitutional problems raised by this bill. There are two broad questions involved: First, does the regulation of the employer-employee relationship as herein provided violate due process of law; and, secondly, can Federal jurisdiction over this relationship be sustained under the commerce clause?

The authority of Congress to guarantee freedom of organization, to prohibit the company-dominated union, and to prevent employers from requiring membership or nonmembership in any union, has been completely upheld in Texas & New Orleans Railroad Co. v. Brotherhood (281 U. S. 548 (1930)). This was a suit by a labor union to restrain the railroad from interfering, in violation of the Railway Labor Act of 1926, with the right of its employees to self-organization and the designation of representatives. The decree of the lower court had provided that the railroad company should: first, completely disestablish its company union; second, reinstate the Brotherhood as representative until the employees by secret ballot should make a choice; third, restore to service and to stated privileges certain employees who had been discharged for activities in behalf of the Brotherhood. The Supreme Court, with Chief Justice Hughes writing for a unanimous Court sustaining the decree, said:

The legality of collective action on the part of employees in order to safeguard their proper interests is not to be disputed. It has long been recognized that employees are entitled to organize for the purpose of securing the redress of grievances and to promote agreements with employers concerning rates of pay and conditions of work. * * * Congress was not required to ignore this right of the employees, but could safeguard it and seek to make their appropriate collective action an instrument of peace rather than of strife. Such collective action would be a mockery if representation were made futile by interference with freedom of choice.

Thus the Supreme Court sustained a decree prohibiting, in substance, all except the last of the unfair labor practices listed in this bill, and it is particularly significant that this decree was based upon a law containing only the first of these practices. Brushing aside the much-criticized earlier cases which had declared the prohibition of the "yellow dog" contract unconstitutional, Chief Justice Hughes said:

The petitioners invoke the principle declared in Adair v. United States (208 U. S. 1, 61) and Coppage v. Kansas (236 U. S. 1), but these decisions are inapplicable. The Railway Labor Act of 1926 does not interfere with the normal exercise of the right of the carrier to select its employees or to discharge them. The statute is not aimed at this right of the employers but at the interference with the right of employees to have representatives of their own choosing. As the carrier subject to the act has no constitutional right to interfere with the freedom of the employees in making their selections they cannot complain of the statute on constitutional grounds.

When we realize that this prevailing and unanimous opinion rendered by the Chief Justice followed precisely the line of reasoning that he had followed when dissenting in the Coppage case, and that the two cases are really identical in principle, we can have no doubt that Coppage against Kansas and Adair against United States have been overruled.

It is true that the Texas case involved the interests of railway workers. But its decision upon the question of due process is equally applicable wherever congressional jurisdiction over interstate commerce can be established. Let us now examine the grounds for Federal jurisdiction.

A vast number of strikes have arisen in protestation against the denial of the rights guaranteed by section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act and reaffirmed by the present bill. Certainly, many similar outbreaks will be prevented if these rights are secured, for whenever given a fair trial the protection of collective bargaining has promoted industrial peace. And that strikes burden commerce cannot be denied, in view of the recognition of this fact by such landmarks of our law as In re Debs (158 U. S. 564), Duplex Printing Press Co. v. Deering (254 U. S. 443), American Steel Foundries v. Tri-City Central Trades Council (257 U. S. 184), Coronado Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers (268 U. S. 295), and Bedford Cut Stone Co. v. Stone Cutters Association (274 U. S. 37). Moreover, the courts which have enunciated so broad an interpretation of commerce when the result has been to frustrate the attempts of wage earners to better their economic conditions by collective action, will be constrained to take an equally broad view in order to diminish strikes by preventing the unfair labor practices which incite them.

Those cases under the antitrust laws which have been cited for the proposition that the Federal Government cannot deal with the employer-employee relationship are not applicable. For where the courts have refused to enjoin strikes under the antitrust laws, it has not been for lack of constitutional power but because the burden upon commerce was not deemed such as the antitrust laws intended to prohibit. Statutory construction of these laws fixed the boundaries of equity jurisdiction. But the Federal Government has the power under the Constitution to prevent any burden whatsoever upon interstate commerce. And there can be no doubt that Congress intends this power to be exercised in full to prevent unfair practices that cause or threaten to cause even the slightest burden.

It is clear that these practices may be enjoined even before the strike occurs. As Chief Justice Taft said in the first Coronado case (259 U. S. 344 (1922)):

If Congress deems certain recurring practices, although not really part of interstate commerce, likely to obstruct, restrain, or burden it, it has the power to subject them to national supervision or restraint.

I want to emphasize ever more strongly the constitutional power and the intent of Congress to prevent these unfair labor practices even where they do not lead or threaten to lead to strikes. As economic conditions have changed, courts on the whole have shown an increasing willingness to recognize that unsound business practices are a direct burden upon the regularity and volume of commerce. One example is the line of cases dealing with unfair competition under the Federal Trade Commission Act. The principle is well stated in another connection in Chicago Board of Trade v. Olsen (262 U. S. 1 (1922)), upholding Federal regulation of future sales on grain exchanges, an activity in itself purely local. The Court said:

The question of price dominates trade between the States. Sales of an article which affect the country-wide price of the article directly affect the country-wide commerce in it. For this reason Congress has the power to provide the appropriate means adopted in this act by which this abuse may be restrained and avoided.

In effect upon commerce, wages are indistinguishable from prices. In fact, each is significant only in terms of the other. When wages sink to low levels, the decline in purchasing power is felt upon the marts of trade. And since collective bargaining is the most powerful single force in maintaining and advancing wage rates, its repudiation is likely to intensify the maldistribution of buying power, thus reducing standards of living, unbalancing the economic structure, and inducing depression with its devastating effect upon the flow of commerce.

In the more recent case of Appalachian Coals, Inc., v. United States (288 U. S. 344 (1933)), Chief Justice Hughes said:

The interests of producers and consumers are interlinked. When industry is grievously hurt, when producing concerns fail, when unemployment mounts, and communities dependent upon profitable production are prostrated, the wells of commerce go dry.

This statement will long be a beacon light to guide those who are seeking to make our law consonant to the needs of our social and economic life. While the pending bill of course does not intend to go beyond the constitutional power of Congress, as that power may be marked out by the courts, it seeks the full limit of that power to prevent these unfair labor practices. It seeks to prevent them whether they affect interstate commerce by causing strikes, or by destroying the equality of bargaining power upon which the flow of commerce depends, or by occurring in interstate commerce.

The recent decision in the Weirton case is based upon Judge Nields' finding that the activities of the Weirton company did not interfere with the freedom of employees to organize, as guaranteed by section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act. It seems clear that this decision is far out of line with that of the United States Supreme Court in the Texas case (supra), which held that activities similar to those at Weirton were illegal under the Railway Labor Act of 1926, an act no more specific in its terms than section 7 (a). Not a single lawyer with whom I have talked has been able to explain Judge Nields' failure not only to distinguish, but even to refer to the Texas case. And even if it were to be conceded that Judge Nields correctly interpreted section 7 (a), his decision merely emphasized the need for strengthening that section and creating a permanent administrative tribunal, versed in the complexities of labor relations, to deal with such matters.

Since Judge Nields found that section 7(a) did not outlaw the activities complained of at Weirton, his discussion of the constitutionality of that section was pure dictum. I cannot believe that this decision of a single district judge as to the extent of the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce will weigh very heavily with this Senate, particularly since his limited conception of interstate commerce, while in line with many early decisions of the United States Supreme Court, is clearly at odds with later decisions which I have discussed and which are more responsive to the changing character of our national economic life.

It is even clearer that the recent decision of the Supreme Court in the Railway Pension case has absolutely no applicability to this bill. That case held, rightly or wrongly, that the retirement of superannuated workers had no recognizable relationship to the efficiency of interstate transportation. The opinion of Mr. Justice Roberts expressly distinguished the situation covered by the Texas case, supra, where a statute was designed to promote interstate commerce by preserving industrial peace.

PROMOTION OF INDUSTRIAL PEACE

This bill is designed to promote industrial peace. The bitterness and the heavy cost of economic conflicts between employers and workers in this country constitute a long and tragic story. Between 1915 and 1931 there were 4,856 strikes, involving the surrender of 2,795,000 jobs and the loss of 72,957,000 working days. At least $1,000,000,000 per year have been wasted because of these controversies.

This toll of private warfare cannot be measured by statistics alone, for it places the taint of hatred and the stain of bloodshed across the pathway to amicable and profitable business dealings. Nor can we be satisfied to allow these troubles to proceed unchecked to their bitter conclusion. A do-nothing procedure leaves the temporary victor as exhausted as the temporarily vanquished, and sows the seeds for recurrent strife when the competitors have rallied from their efforts.

One method of approach to the problem of industrial peace would be for the Government to invoke compulsory arbitration, or to dictate the terms of settlement whenever a controversy arises. Where this procedure has been tried in European nations it has met with only questionable success. In any event, it is so alien to our American traditions of individual enterprise that it would provoke extreme resentment and constant discord.

It is clear that in this country peace must be based upon reason rather than upon force. We have cherished always the ideal of employers and workers meeting together with friendly and open minds in order that they may exchange views and arrive at solutions based not upon compulsion but upon mutual concessions and mutual benefit. This may be termed the method of conference, of give and take, of free cooperation.

The best example of the conference or voluntary method of ironing out disagreements is the railway industry. Because of the vital connection between steady transportation and the very lives of our people, the Government early took steps to set up machinery for the peaceful adjustment of railway-labor disputes. The central idea of all these efforts has been to promote the making of collective agreements between employers and workers without exercising any compulsion upon either side.

In seeking these ends, however, the Government did not rely upon a policy of complete laissez faire. It soon saw the necessity of establishing by law the underlying conditions from which agreements might arise. It protected employees in their right to organize and bargain collectively. It applied to the railway industry the principle of majority rule, and it abolished the union that was interfered with or financed by the company.

The application of these rules of fair play yielded the finest results. Not once since 1894 has serious strife upon the railroads hardened our arteries of trade. It was to be expected that such a record of success would be emulated elsewhere, and when our entry into the World War made it imperative to cement the bonds of cordiality between employers and workers the War Labor Board was established. This Board immediately applied the principles that governed the railway industry. It was remarkable that not a single strike or lock-out in defiance of an award of the War Labor Board occurred until after the armistice; and the United States was the only belligerent unvexed by major labor disturbances.

It is a matter of record that one of the most prolific causes of strikes has been the failure to apply to industry generally the rules of industrial democracy underlying the conference method. At least 25 percent of the labor disputes in recent years has resulted from denials of the procedure of collective bargaining. In regard to the steel strike of 1919, which was one of the severest and most disastrous affrays in recent history, the impartial commission of inquiry of the Interchurch World Movement said that both sides agreed that the occasion of the strike was the failure to recognize the friendly conference idea. Of the 3,655 new cases received by the regional agencies of the present National Labor Relations Board during the second half of 1934 and the first month of 1935, the issue of collective bargaining was paramount in 2,330 cases, or about 74 percent.

The pending bill is designed merely to apply to industry generally the benefits of our rich American experience. While it has been branded radical by some and ultraconservative by others, every one of its principles has been sanctioned by a long train of laws of Congress. While it has been called inopportune and hasty, it is responsive to the serious industrial disturbances of last summer, when blood ran freely in the streets and martial law was in the offing. While some think it one-sided and directed against industry, it is trained upon the solution of problems that have plagued industry as much as any other group. In its search for industrial peace combined with economic justice, it appeals to the conscience and intelligence of all those who know the history of our country and are imbued with its high ideals. In applying the healing balm of an upright, impartial, and peaceful forum to industry and labor it will benefit employers, workers, and the country at large.

During the delivery of Mr. WAGNER's speech—

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not understand the statement of the Senator from New York that "all such orders will be fully reviewable by any aggrieved party in the Federal courts."

Mr. WAGNER. Parties to the controversy, of course.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; but what is meant by the term "by any aggrieved party"? I am asking for information.

Mr. WAGNER. Suppose the Board orders an election, which is held. Then a controversy arises as to who was really elected by a majority of the workers, the company making one contention, and a representative of the workers making another contention. That controversy will be heard by the Board, evidence will be taken, and then, if either party is dissatisfied with the order of the Board, based upon the supposed violation of a legal right, such party may have a review in the courts.

Mr. ROBINSON. The point I am asking about is, What is the meaning of the words "by any aggrieved party"? The language is not clear to me.

Mr. WAGNER. The bill itself is clearer than my statement. I assume that the meaning is by parties to the controversy which is heard before the Board.

After the conclusion of Mr. WAGNER's speech—

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MURRAY in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WAGNER. I am glad to yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I did not hear all, but what I did hear of the able Senator's discussion of the proposed legislation deeply impressed me by its force, persuasiveness, and learning.

Is it fair to conclude that the proposed legislation will have important values for national and industrial development and peace, whether the National Industrial Recovery Act shall be continued or not?

Mr. WAGNER. Of course, I answer in the affirmative, absolutely.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Is it proper to say that the measure is designed to apply to all industries which affect commerce?

Mr. WAGNER. That is the intent.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Is it to be understood that the proposed legislation's admirable purposes are to be attained by authorized Federal investigations with a view to voluntary settlement of industrial disputes; by outlawing company unions; by the assurance of majority rule among workers organized to bargain collectively with employers; and by the maintenance of a permanent and impartial national relations board?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; and by the prohibition of certain unfair labor practices which are enumerated in the bill and which are intended to make the worker a free man, to decide for himself whether he wants an organization, and if he wants one, what the type of that organization shall be.

Mr. COSTIGAN. With such features the proposed legislation evidently embodies some of the settled conclusions of our foremost industrial experts. The measure is clearly intended to support recommendations both of acknowledged industrial leaders in America and of America's organized labor movement. Nor are such convictions new. Almost 20 years ago they were urged as the prevailing expert judgment of those best informed on industrial problems, appearing at that time before the United States Industrial Relations Commission, which surveyed the entire field of industrial relations for a couple of years by authority of Congress and with commissioners of ability appointed by President Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. WAGNER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just for a clarification?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. McCARRAN. I have admired the Senator's presentation. I am very favorable to his bill. What I desire to know, in keeping with the question propounded by the Senator from Colorado, is whether the continuation of the N. R. A. is in anywise linked with the bill now before the Senate.

Mr. WAGNER. It is not. Of course, the N. I. R. A. has section 7 (a) in it; but this bill proposes, in the first place, to define the rights of labor more clearly; and, secondly, to implement them by certain enforcement sanctions.

Mr. McCARRAN. Just one further inquiry. Am I correct in saying that even though the N. R. A. should pass out of existence with section 7 (a) as it now stands in the N. R. A. Act, we should have all the beneficial results that might flow from section 7 (a) if we should enact the pending bill?

Mr. WAGNER. That is certainly a correct statement so far as section 7 (a) is concerned.

Mr. McCARRAN. I thank the Senator.

RURAL ELECTRIFICATION

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935 carried an appropriation of $100,000,000, which was earmarked for the purpose of rural electrification; and those of us who are interested in the efforts of the administration to provide cheap electric energy for the farmers confront the necessity of informing the farmers how to obtain this cheap power.

If the $100,000,000 is merely to be siphoned off into channels which can only serve to step up the revenues of private power utilities, in my judgment the program of rural electrification probably will not be of very much value to the farmers.

I myself have had some experience in the matter of aiding farmers to obtain cheap power for their farms, because in my State the farmers have organized themselves into power companies (for distribution only) owned, controlled, and operated by the farmers; and there, in those activities, they have for themselves solved this problem of getting cheap power to the farm.

The National Popular Government League, with its office in Washington, D. C., has prepared another one of its very illuminating bulletins, it being merely one of a number of bulletins dealing with power and other public questions. This is Bulletin No. 171, and is entitled "Who Will Get the $100,000,000 for Farm Electrification?" It is a discussion of policies which farmers ought to pursue to establish some reasonable foot rules for estimating honest costs of service. I should like to have this bulletin incorporated in the Record as a part of my remarks, and for that purpose I send it to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bulletin is as follows:

NATIONAL POPULAR GOVERNMENT LEAGUE,
Takoma Park Station, Washington, D. C.
Bulletin No. 171, April 25, 1935
(By Judson King, Director)

WHO WILL GET THE $100,000,000 FOR FARM ELECTRIFICATION?— POLICIES FOR FARMERS TO DETERMINE AND SOME FOOT RULES FOR ESTIMATING HONEST COSTS OF SERVICE

In recent Federal work-relief legislation $100,000,000 has been earmarked to make a start toward farm electrification in the United States. That is due to the fact that during the past 6 years President Roosevelt has closely studied the subject and has a vital interest in it.

This means that all over the Nation in localities where farmers promptly come forward and cooperate, low-tension rural distribution lines will be built, buildings will be wired to carry current to light the house, the barn, and the yards; to do the washing and ironing; to pump water for the house—including, perhaps, the newly installed bathroom—to water the stock, run motors to chop feed, grind grain, and turn the grindstone; to furnish refrigeration, cleaner and better than ice, and to operate many other appliances which ease the work burden and bring a far greater degree of comfort, enjoyment, and profit to farm life. Ask the farmer who has tried it, or, still better, his wife and children.

It costs more to deliver electricity to widely scattered farm homes than to urban residences. A vast majority of farmers have never been able to stand the expense and their present deflated condition aggravates the situation. Hence the hundred million dollars.

Assuming that the President will soon designate an agency to spend this money, the first question which arises is, who is going to get it? Manifestly, it will be either municipally owned power plants, or public power districts, or farm cooperatives organized on a nonprofit basis, or private power companies on a profit-making basis.

Manifestly, again, public bodies have the first right to this Federal money, just as a municipality, a State, or power district has the first claim before the Federal Power Commission on a water-power site. If they do not exercise this right, then the site goes to a private company making application for it.

This advance of $100,000,000 gives the existing municipally owned power plants the greatest opportunity which has ever come to them to extend electric service into the country and benefit both themselves and the farmers. It offers an inspiring opportunity to cooperatives either established or newly formed for that purpose.

If the people and the public plants do not vigorously embrace this opportunity, then they will have no grounds for complaint if the private companies get the money and spend it. It is known that they are on hand in Washington now asking for it.

Now is the time for farmers to get accurate information on honest costs of electric installation and do some grim thinking on the best policy. There is no sense in spending millions of Government money to build distribution lines unless the cost of current is to be the cheapest possible. Otherwise the farmers cannot continue the use of the service. On the other hand, the success of the President's effort depends absolutely upon the support it receives from farm communities not yet electrified, which, incidentally, constitute 88 percent of the farms of the Nation.

Remember sharply that this rural electrification scheme is primarily an aid to self-help. It calls for the exercise of "rugged individualism" and the "pioneer spirit." The administration proposes to do what the private companies have not done in adequate fashion for the past 20 years because there was not enough money in it and what the bankers will not do today save on prohibitive security conditions and interest rates—namely, loan money to build the lines and furnish equipment.

Of course, the farmers may expect to be told by certain high political and utility spokesmen in both parties that any part of this $100,000,000 advanced to municipalities or cooperatives is "communism" and destructive of the farmer's "liberty", but if given to private companies it will be praised as proper encouragement to business in helping recovery. This ancient twaddle need disturb no intelligent person. The point is, the farmers need electricity and this is the only way thousands of them can get it at all. There are two main points to be considered at the outset in planning:

1. What are honest costs for line and equipment construction and appliances, and honest rates for the current to be used through the years?

2. What is the best policy to be pursued, recognizing the fact that costs will vary under differing conditions and that some farm communities will not have the spirit, the initiative, and the leadership to do this job for themselves?

FOOT RULES FOR FARMERS

As to costs and the steps to be taken in applying for a loan, it will contribute to clarity if the subject is dealt with in the form of definite questions and answers, as follows:

1. Where will the electricity be obtained?

It will be supplied either from an existing "high" line owned by a utility company or a municipality, or from a newly constructed generating station, using water power, coal, or a diesel engine.

2. How many electricity be procured for the farm?

The usual procedure in the past has been to apply to the local utility for service. With the Government embarking upon a rural electrification program, the most effective procedure would now seem to be to direct inquiries to the Government agency in charge of this work.

3. What Government agency will direct rural electrification?

President Roosevelt will probably very soon designate the agency which will administer the $100,000,000 program.

4. What immediate procedure should the farmer follow?

Discuss the matter with your county agricultural agent, county deputy master of the grange, county farm bureau adviser, or corresponding official in your county. With him sketch a map showing the proposed line, the prospective customers, and approximate distances between customers. This map, together with any other pertinent information, such as the number of various appliances which it is expected will be connected to the line, should be forwarded to the agency in Washington which will handle the work. The Government will probably send representatives who will be able to advise the farmers as to how to proceed further.

5. What charge should be made for electric service?

In the ordinary farm community with at least three customers per mile of line a minimum charge to cover line costs might lie between $3 and $3.50 per month. This minimum amount to cover interest and sinking-fund charges will pay for the use of sufficient energy on the average farm for lighting and water pumping.

6. What is a fair rate to be paid for the added current used?

Additional energy should be purchased at a progressively decreasing cost. A fair rate for either a private company or a co-operative at the start would give a total monthly charge of $5 for 100 kilowatt-hours, $7 for 200 kilowatt-hours, $8.50 for 300 kilowatt-hours, and all over this amount at 1 cent per kilowatt-hour.¹ (For the number of kilowatt-hours used by various appliances see the answer to question 9.)

It should be stated, however, that it is not likely that at the present time one rate will apply to the country at large, although the time may come when uniform rates will be universal. The type and characteristics of the electric line, the number of customers per mile, and, more important, the amount used per customer are all important factors in arriving at a fair rate. With the construction of the electric line certain, annual charges must be paid by the owner of the line, such as interest on the money invested, depreciation, and operation and maintenance. Manifestly, the more customers per mile, the lower the cost for each customer. These charges accrue whether or not any electricity is used from the line.

Estimates indicate that on a rural line in average territory, with three customers per mile, there must be a total annual usage by these three customers of about 3,600 kilowatt-hours if a low rate is to be had. The cost of such a line ready to serve the three customers will be about $1,000 per mile. With more customers per mile, the cost and required use would increase slightly.

7. What will it cost to wire the house and barn?

The cost will vary from about $40 upward, depending upon such things as the type of wiring and fixtures chosen, the size of the house and barn, the number of outlets required, local labor rates, and the amount of work done by the farmer himself. Sufficient outlets should be installed so that appliances may readily be connected where most convenient. Your local electrical contractor will be glad to give you an estimate.

8. How can the cost of wiring be financed?

If you cannot make an outright payment, a loan may be obtained through a Government agency providing for repayment over a period of years.

9. What appliances are available and at what cost?

There are over 250 different appliances now in use. The more useful of them, together with their cost and approximate consumption, are as follows:

Household appliances	Approximate annual consumption (kilowatt-hours)	Approximate first cost of appliance
Automatic water pump for shallow well.....	150	$75 upward.
Washing machine.....	25	$45 upward.
Vacuum cleaner.....	25	$15 upward.
Refrigerator.....	600	$75 upward.
Range.....	1,800	$65 upward.
Radio.....	80	$10 upward.
Iron.....	60	$4 upward.
Fan.....	20	$3 upward.
Water heater.....	3,000	$65 upward.

BARN AND FARM APPLIANCES

Motor, 1 horsepower, single phase, uses about 0.9 kilowatt-hour per hour of operation, approximate cost $40 upward.

Motor, 5 horsepower, single phase, uses about 3.75 kilowatt-hours per hour of operation, approximate cost $150 upward.

Cream separators use about 0.33 kilowatt-hour per hour of operation, approximate cost $30 upward.

Milking machines use about 0.25 kilowatt-hour per hour of operation, approximate cost $85 upward.

Five horsepower motor with pump uses about 3.75 kilowatt-hours per hour of operation, approximate cost $380 upward. This pump will deliver 350 gallons of water per minute with 40-foot head.

Incubator, 300-egg size, uses about 0.25 kilowatt-hour per hour of operation, costs from $70 upward.

The use of a water pump makes possible the installation of an inside bathroom the fixtures for which bath tub, toilet, and wash basin will cost from $50 upward.

10. Under what plans may appliances be purchased?

There is an existing Government agency, the T. V. A. Electric Home and Farm Authority, through which appliances may be purchased and paid for in monthly payments extending over longer periods than those now in effect with private companies. The length of time allowed for payment is defined by the useful life of the appliance. The plan now in effect is designed specifically for financing urban domestic appliances. With the formation of a broad rural program, appropriate terms will probably be arranged to accommodate this type of business.

POLICY: TWO METHODS OF FINANCING

As to policy, there are two key things to consider—ownership and amortization, it being assumed that the money advanced by the Government will be repaid to the Government in something like 20 years. Something like 60 percent of the present over-all cost of distributing electric current is the cost of capital invested in equipment.

If then a private company borrows some of this $100,000,000 to build farm lines, it may be assumed that the company will collect enough in rates from the farmers for it to repay the interest and principal on the Government loan. It will own the lines, and if the usual practice is continued it will set up this amount as an "investment" on which "a fair return"—say, 6 percent—must be paid by the farmer as long as the company lives and the farmer buys current.

On the other hand, if a municipality or farm cooperative borrows the money, it will also collect in rates enough to pay principal and interest, but the interest charge will gradually grow less as the amortization charges are paid and finally vanish. There will be no debt, and the "fair return" will be kept by the farmers in the form of cheaper rates.

These are the basic differences between two methods of financing a utility. It needs to be held in mind without further discussion of the old controversy over private versus public ownership. A brief notice of some practical examples will be in point.

Gage County, Nebr.

Gage County, Nebr., furnishes an example in line with what farmers may expect to be offered by private power companies co-operating with the electrification program.

The southeastern Nebraska power district was organized under a recent State law authorizing the setting up of public power districts. It was allotted by the Public Works Administration an outright grant of $140,000, and bonds in the amount of $435,000 to build some 595 miles of distribution lines to serve an estimated 1,358 rural and village customers.

It is proposed that the district buy its wholesale power from the Gage County Electric Co., a subsidiary of the Atlantic Gas & Electric Corporation, a holding company with offices in Boston, Mass., organized under the laws of Delaware.

Wholesale rate: The district is to pay the company 3 cents per kilowatt-hour for the first 50,000 kilowatt-hours, 2 cents per kilowatt-hour for all in excess.

Retail rates: The proposed rates for farmers are $4.25 minimum monthly charge, including 25 kilowatt-hours (equals 17 cents per kilowatt-hour), 6 cents per kilowatt-hour for the next 25, 3 cents per kilowatt-hour for all above 50.

To get a line on how these rates work out in the average monthly bill as compared with what city users pay, the Edison Electric Institute reports that the average domestic customer in 1933 used 604 kilowatt-hours for which he paid $33.16, or an average of 5.49 cents per kilowatt-hour. This usage furnishes but little more than is necessary for lighting a house. The above figures work out thus:

Average American city user, 50 kilowatt-hours at 5.49 cents equals $2.76 per month, or $33.16 per year.

Gage County farmer, 50 kilowatt-hours at 11.5 cents equals $5.75 per month, or $69 per year.

The Edison Electric Institute reports central and eastern farmers using an average in 1933 of 770 kilowatt-hours per year for which they paid $49.65. Compare Gage County:

Average American farmer uses 64 kilowatt-hours at 6.45 cents equals $4.13 per month, or $49.65 a year.

Gage County farmer, 64 kilowatt-hours at 9.64 cents equals $6.17 per month, or $70.04 a year.

It is evident if the $100,000,000 is spent on the Gage County basis it will benefit the companies, but will not increase the use of electricity or electrify rural America.

If a Gage County farmer used a relatively small amount for house and barn service, say 200 kilowatt-hours monthly, it would cost him $10.25 or $123 annually at an average rate of 5.13 cents per kilowatt-hour.

It is understood that the promoter of the above power district was Mr. C. F. Shaffer, of Beatrice, Nebr., manager of the Gage County Electric Co., who writes in his prospectus urging the plan: "It is assumed that the farm income will be sufficient to enable the consumers in certain sections to pay electric rates higher than prevailing rates to make the project self-liquidating."

Certainly the wholesale rates charged will help sustain the operating company and the holding company above it.

Pierce County, Wash.

In 1912 the city of Tacoma completed a large hydro-electric plant on the Nisqually River some 35 miles from the city. The transmission lines from this plant passed over a big farming community which had not previously been served with electric energy because the Stone & Webster power interests had refused to extend their service into that community except at a base rate of 14 cents per kilowatt-hour, in addition to which they demanded long-term contracts and that the farmers virtually pay for the lines. The farmers could not meet these onerous conditions.

The city of Tacoma was without legal power to distribute energy to these farmers. Under an existing State law various communities of farmers organized several little mutual, nonstock, cooperative companies, of a corporate nature, secured franchises from Pierce County and laid out and built their own distribution systems. Because the city had no power to distribute outside, these little companies were compelled to build to the city limits so that they could buy current and take delivery at a point inside the city.

The cost record of one of these companies indicates that its distribution lines were built at a cost of around $600 per mile. Many of the farmers worked out their membership costs by helping to build these lines. Eight or ten of these little farmer-mutual companies are now supplying service to around 3,000 farm homes. The membership fee in these companies ran from $75 to $125. The interest of each member is evidenced by his membership certificate. The city of Tacoma wholesales them current at the industrial power rate which is its lowest power rate and begins at 2 cents per kilowatt-hour and goes down to approximately a mill and a half. The more power the farmer line buys, the cheaper the current, and there is every inducement for the farmers to increase their use of energy, thereby obtaining a constantly cheaper rate for themselves. One company, the Elmhurst Mutual Co., distributes current to its members at the rate of 5 cents per kilowatt-hour for the first 20 kilowatt-hours and 1 cent per kilowatt-hour for all over that. A Captain Waldwick, who owned one of the large chicken ranches on the lines of that company, used 13,000 kilowatt-hours in 1 month which cost him $130.80. At the proposed rates for Gage County, Nebr., his bill would have been $394.25. Since his membership in this little company cost him less than $100 it is evident that the cost of membership was a small factor, as compared with the saving in power rates.

I am indebted to Senator HOMER T. BONE, from the State of Washington, for the above information. Prior to coming to Congress he was attorney for some of these farmer power companies and organized the largest one of them. He is author of the Bone power bill, passed by the Washington State Legislature in 1933 after a 15-year fight, and this measure gives the big municipally owned plants of that State the right to freely sell electric energy outside of their corporate interests. The Senate is familiar with the financial status of these farmer-owned power companies and says that their 20 years' operation demonstrates that they are sound and successful. These companies have built up over the years a surplus out of revenues to take care of obsolescence and depreciation. Their corporate powers permit them to supply electric accessories to their members at cost. Being private companies, they pay taxes like the power trust.

Alcorn County, Miss.

Farmers interested in county organization units should write to the T. V. A., department of electricity, Chattanooga, Tenn., and get the recent report on the operation of Alcorn County, Miss., power authority for the first 6 months of operation, June-November 1934. Here town and country have united. There is one rate for all. A fine description of the method of organization is given as well as figures on results thus far. It started off with an average reduction of 42 percent in rates. For example, where the Mississippi Power Co. charged $3.50 for 50 kilowatt-hours the authority charged $2. In 6 months consumption had increased materially and the enterprise had paid all operating and capital costs, including taxes and depreciation, and had a surplus profit of $14,000 to be applied to amortization and new construction. At this rate the entire present debt of $142,000 will be paid off by January 1, 1938.

Los Angeles County, Calif.

Mr. F. E. Scattergood, chief electrical engineer of the Bureau of Power and Light of Los Angeles, reports that for several years the city has been serving the rural and small urban users in the San Fernando Valley at city rates. The area covered comprises 120,000 acres, largely composed of farms from 2 to 100 acres in size along with rural towns and small industries. There are now around 10,000 farmers, including subsistence farmers, and practically every home is electrified.

The average monthly bill is less than one-half the price formerly charged by the private company. The whole was worked out by the city engineers and officials years ago, and is a practical illustration of planned economy to which students and administrators in this field should give attention. In many respects it is a model for the Nation. The present domestic combination schedule for city and for these farmers and subsistence dwellers is:

	Cents
First 35 kilowatt-hours	4.8
Next 140 kilowatt-hours	2.5
All in excess of 175 kilowatt-hours	1.5
Water heater, separate meter	1.0

Note sharply that Los Angeles has been and is amortizing its capital investment out of these low rates, and has not added a surcharge for "self-liquidation", as proposed in Nebraska.

Seattle's city light and the farmers

The farmers of Washington to the north of Seattle have recently voted several power districts. Will they pay 3 cents and 2 cents for wholesale current? Hardly. The great Skagit development owned by the city of Seattle will deliver power to them at around 1 cent. Furthermore, they will have the honest and sympathetic advice of Seattle's able engineer, J. D. Ross, who, incidentally, is also a horticulturalist, in planning, and it is of superlative importance for farmers to get the right engineer.

NEW YORK POWER AUTHORITY

There are engineers and engineers, as the New York Power Authority, Hon. Frank P. Walsh, chairman, found when it needed to discover the actual cost of distributing electricity. It had to make its own investigation, and its report is of value to farmers as well as town people everywhere. In this work the Authority had the guidance of one of its members, Mr. Morris L. Cooke, consulting engineer, of Philadelphia, now a member of the National Power Policy Committee. Distribution costs were found to be not nearly so high as claimed by private power-company engineers.

GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

Remember that the data and costs given in the questionnaire under the head "Foot rules for farmers" apply to private companies, and before making contracts above these figures you should stop, look, and listen—and consult.

Remember that, as Col. William T. Chantland, assistant chief counsel of the Federal Trade Commission, recently stated to the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, the investigation of the Trade Commission of power companies showed that for the past 20 years the private companies, as a rule, have ignored farm extension, except where the farmers were made to pay construction costs and high rates. It was not until the President's program got under way that the companies discovered such warm interest in farmers. In the opinion of this writer, this interest is political more than economic.

The average farm home, the one with which the administration is concerned, must have, not light and radio alone but power for washing, ironing, pumping, and machines run by motor, if the program is to succeed.

The average farmer cannot afford to pay more than from 2 cents to 3 cents per kilowatt-hour for the amount of current needed; and if any agency, public or private, raises that price to from 5 to 10 cents, it defeats the purpose of the $100,000,000.

American agriculture is staggering under mortgages and interest thereon. It will be mere folly to plaster another series of mortgages on it in the shape of watered stocks for operating and holding companies on which the farmers must pay interest and profits for the next half century. But this is exactly what private enterprise is endeavoring to do, and will succeed in doing if we don't watch out.

SETTLEMENT OF LABOR DISPUTES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1958) to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, to diminish the causes of labor disputes, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, we have now reached the stage where the committee amendments will be taken up for disposition. I therefore think a quorum call should be had.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MURRAY in the chair). The absence of a quorum being suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Burke	Fletcher	King
Ashurst	Byrd	Frazier	La Follette
Austin	Byrnes	George	Lewis

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I rise merely to reannounce the absence of the Senators whose names I have given earlier in the day, and the reasons for their not being present at the moment of this roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

THE ADMINISTRATION FARM PROGRAM—ADDRESS BY PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the speech delivered by the President yesterday at the White House to the delegation of farmers.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, is this the celebrated "liar" speech?

Mr. BARKLEY. It is the speech referred to earlier in the day by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LONG. I am not objecting; I am merely asking a question.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is the only speech the President made yesterday.

Mr. LONG. Is it the "liar" speech?

Mr. BARKLEY. It is the one referred to by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], when he said there were still some liars alive in the country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to have a speech delivered by the President inserted in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT, DELIVERED FROM THE SOUTH PORTICO OF THE WHITE HOUSE, TO FARMERS WHO HAVE CONVENED IN WASHINGTON FOR THE PURPOSE OF SUPPORTING THE ADMINISTRATION'S AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM, TUESDAY AFTERNOON, MAY 14, 1935

I am glad to welcome you to the National Capital. We can think of this occasion as a kind of surprise birthday party, for it was just 2 years and 2 days ago that the Agricultural Adjustment Act became a law. And I well remember the fine group of representatives of farmers from every part of the Union who stood around me on that occasion when I signed the act.

In record time you and thousands of other farmers took hold and set up the machinery to control your own affairs and put the new law to work.

I remember, too, the many high and mighty people who said you could not do it—that it was no use for you to try—intimating clearly that their only remedy to improve your situation was to let the sheriffs' sales go on. That was the old and very familiar way—the high and mighty balanced farm production with demand. Those people did not understand, and many of them do not understand today, that if the farm population of the United States suffers and loses its purchasing power, the people in the cities, of necessity, suffer with them. One of the greatest lessons that the city dwellers have come to understand in this past 2 years is this: Empty pocketbooks on the farm don't turn factory wheels in the city.

Go back for a minute to the spring of 1933, when there was a huge carry-over of almost 13,000,000 bales, and a price, because of that carry-over, of 6 cents a pound. You and I know what 6-cent cotton means to the purchasing power of the Cotton Belt.

There was a huge carry-over of tobacco, and the price of tobacco during the preceding 6 months was the lowest on record for many years. Wheat, with a carry-over of nearly 400,000,000 bushels, and a price of 35 cents on the farm; corn, with a price of 15 cents a bushel on many farms; hogs, selling at 3 cents a pound.

You and I know what that meant in the way of purchasing power for 40,000,000 people.

When we came to Washington we were faced with three possible programs. The first involved price fixing by Government decree. This was discarded because the problem of overproduction was not solved thereby.

The second was a plan to let farmers grow as much as they wanted to and to have the Federal Government then step in, take from them that portion of their crop which represented the exportable surplus and, in their name, on their behalf, dump this surplus on the other nations of the world. That plan was discarded because the other nations of the world had already begun to stop dumping. With increasing frequency they were raising their tariffs, establishing quotas, and clamping on embargoes against just that kind of proposition.

Therefore, we came to the third plan—a plan for the adjustment of totals in our major crops so that from year to year production and consumption would be kept in reasonable balance with each other to the end that reasonable prices would be paid to farmers for their crops and to the end that unwieldy surpluses would not depress our markets and upset the balance.

We are now at the beginning of the third year of carrying out this policy. You know the results thus far attained. You know the price of cotton, of wheat, of tobacco, of corn, of hogs, and of other farm products today. Further comment on the successful partial attainment of our objective up to this time is unnecessary on my part. You know.

I want to emphasize that word "adjustment." As you know, a great many of the high and mighty—with special axes to grind—have been deliberately trying to mislead people who know nothing of farming by misrepresenting—no—why use a pussyfoot word—by lying about the kind of a farm program under which this Nation is operating today.

A few leading citizens have gone astray from ignorance. I must admit it. For example, the prominent city banker who was driving through up-State New York with me 4 or 5 years ago in the late fall. Everything was brown. The leaves were off the trees. We passed a beautiful green field. He asked me what it was. I told him it was winter wheat. He turned to me and said, "That is very interesting. I have always wondered about winter wheat. What I don't understand is how they are able to cut it when it gets covered up with snow."

The other was the editor of a great metropolitan paper. He visited me down in Georgia when the cotton was nearly grown but before the bolls had formed. Looking out over the cotton fields he said to me:

"What a great number of raspberries they grow down here."

Raspberries was right. At $4\frac{1}{2}$ cents a pound for cotton his mistake was, perhaps, a natural one.

I was speaking of adjustment. It is your duty and mine to continue to educate the people of this country to the fact that adjustment means not only adjustment downward but adjustment upward. If you and I agree on a correct figure for a normal carry-over it means that if we have a bumper crop one year we will, by mutual consent, reduce the next year's crop in order to even up that carry-over. At the same time, if we get a short crop in a given year, you and I agree to increase the next year's crop to make up the shortage. That is exactly what we are doing today in the case of wheat.

It is high time for you and for me to carry, by education, knowledge of the fact that not a single program of the A. A. A. contemplated the destruction of an acre of food crops in the United States, in spite of what you may read or be told by people who have special axes to grind.

It is high time for you and for me to make clear that we are not plowing under cotton this year, that we did not plow it under in 1934, and that we only plowed some of it under in 1933 because the Agricultural Adjustment Act was passed after a huge crop of cotton was already in the ground.

It is high time for us to repeat on every occasion that we have not wastefully destroyed food in any form. It is true that the Relief Administrator has purchased hundreds of thousands of tons of foodstuffs to feed the needy and hungry who are on the relief rolls in every part of the United States.

The crocodile tears shed by the professional mourners of an old and obsolete order over the slaughter of little pigs and other measures to reduce surplus agricultural inventories deceive very few thinking people and, least of all, the farmers themselves.

The acknowledged destiny of a pig is sausage, or ham, or bacon, or pork. In these forms millions of pigs were consumed by vast numbers of needy people who otherwise would have had to do without.

Let me make one other point clear for the benefit of the millions in cities who have to buy meats. Last year the Nation suffered a drought of unparalleled intensity. If there had been no Government program—if the old order had obtained in 1933 and 1934—that drought on the cattle ranges of America and in the Corn Belt would have resulted in the marketing of thin cattle, immature hogs, and in the death of these animals on the range and on the farm. Then we would have had a vastly greater shortage than we face today.

Our program saved the lives of millions of head of livestock. They are still on the range. Other millions are today canned and ready for this country to eat.

I think that you and I are agreed in seeking a continuance of a national policy which on the whole is proving successful. The memory of old conditions under which the product of a whole year's work often would not bring you the cost of transporting it to market is too fresh in your minds to let you be led astray by the solemn admonitions and specious lies of those who in the past profited most when your distress was greatest.

You remember, and I remember, that not so long ago the poor had less food to eat and less clothes to wear, and that was at a time when you had practically to give away your products. Then the surpluses were greater and yet the poor were poorer than they are today when you farmers are getting a reasonable although still an insufficient price.

I have not the time to talk with you about many other policies of your Government which affect the farm population of the country. I have not the time to go into the practical work of the Farm Credit Administration, which in all of its ramifications has saved a million farms from foreclosure and has accomplished the first great reduction in exorbitant interest rates that this country has ever known.

Because your cause is so just no one has had the temerity to question the motives of your "march on Washington." It is a good omen for Government, for business, for bankers, and for the city dwellers that the Nation's farmers are becoming articulate and that they know whereof they speak.

I hope you have enjoyed your stay in Washington. Seeing your Government at first hand, you may have a better idea why its efforts at times seem lumbering and slow and complicated. On the other hand, you may have seen that we are moving faster and accomplishing more practical results than you have been led to believe by the high and mighty gentlemen I have spoken of. I want to thank you for your patience with us. I want to pledge our whole-hearted cooperation as you go forward.

FARMERS' VISIT TO WASHINGTON

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I desire to present a resolution, and to have it read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The resolution (S. Res. 139) was read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and is hereby, requested to furnish to the Senate any and all correspondence in his Department touching the gathering of some three or four thousand farmers in the city of Washington during the last 2 or 3 days; whether any instructions had been given by him, or any person in his Department, or any of the various county agents or farm organizations receiving Federal aid, with respect to getting these farmers to come to Washington; how the particular group was selected and by whom, and the purpose of having the said farmers come to Washington at this particular time; and

Resolved further, That the Secretary of Agriculture give to the Senate all information in his possession with respect to any cost borne by the Federal Government, directly or indirectly, in meeting the expenses of the farmers gathered as aforesaid.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator whether there is some particular committee to which he wishes to have the resolution referred? If so, will he indicate it?

Mr. HASTINGS. I ask that it go over under the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will lie over under the rule.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] has just inserted in the RECORD a speech made yesterday to the farmers by the President of the United States. I shall take only a few moments of the Senate's time to make some comments in respect to that subject.

We are told by the newspapers that there are some 4,000 farmers here. I take it, in view of the fact that legislation is pending to amend the A. A. A., that they might very well be called "lobbyists." Certainly that term is applied to other people who come to express their interest in such subjects.

I assume also that the expenses of most of these farmers are being paid directly or indirectly by the Federal Government. I am not quite so much interested in that as I am in the address made by the President to this group. Four times in that speech the President spoke sarcastically of those who criticized the A. A. A. program as "high and mighty." He described them as persons with "special axes to grind." He spoke of them as "lying about the kind of a farm program under which this Nation is operating today." He warned his audience not to "be led astray by the solemn admonitions and specious lies of those who in the past profited most when your distress was greatest." He spoke of "crocodile tears shed by the professional mourners of an old and obsolete order."

The surprising thing to me is that the mild-mannered and genteel, distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] should have seized the first opportunity he had to approve all that has been said. I am quite certain that, knowing all the facts, the distinguished Senator from Illinois would never use such language himself about any group of people in this country regardless of what criticism they might level against him.

In the President's radio speech on April 29 we find these four words standing out boldly in print, directed to the American people, "Feel free to criticize", and within 3 weeks, although the President invited that criticism, he showed in his address to the farmers yesterday that he "cannot take it."

We who have criticized the new deal were earlier called Tories, traitors, whiners, chisellers, and so forth, but now we are called liars, and everybody understands just what that means; and I submit, Mr. President, it comes with little dignity from a man who holds the high position of the President of the United States. But I want to say this to him and to the distinguished Senator who praised what he said here this morning, that if that term is to be applied to all the persons who have criticized the new deal, we have developed the greatest crop of liars within the last 6 months ever found in any country.

The President's speech reminds me of the small-town bully who boldly and courageously calls his opponents foul names when he has his own crowd about him to protect him.

Mr. President, as I read that speech this morning there came to me a letter from a business man who had made a trip to North Carolina, and he gave me his observations. He says among other things:

The A. A. A. is the laughing stock of the industrial world. Mr. Wallace's program is so destructive and senseless as to make it appear like it was subsidized by the Soviet.

When that gentleman reads this morning what the President said yesterday he must conclude that he is in that class of people whom the President called liars.

However, let me see who else has been lying about this. I quote from the editorial columns of the Philadelphia Inquirer; and let the President find for himself how many lies are in this brief editorial. Let us see whether or not he is willing that that term shall apply to this editorial writer and to other editorial writers all over the country. I take it, of course, that he was applying the term to me and to distinguished Senators on this floor on both sides of the Senate Chamber who have been criticizing the A. A. A., because he made no exceptions. He said plainly and without any misunderstanding on the part of anyone that he had to call the people who had criticized the A. A. A. by that term in order to make himself clear.

Let me read this editorial which appeared in the Philadelphia Inquirer on May 14, 1935, under the heading of—

WONDERS OF THE A. A. A.

Some farmers from Texas and points west are concentrating on Washington, shouting for Secretary of Agriculture Wallace and his A. A. A. While denying that they inspired the movement, the Wallace intellectuals are plainly pleased with it, since in a measure it offsets the antagonism aroused by cotton manufacturers.

Cotton growers have been receiving fat checks from the Government for restricting acreage, but what has happened is this: Their normal exports have been reduced nearly one-half. The share-cropper is badly hurt. The price of cotton, boosted by the Government, is disastrous to manufacturers, and numerous mills are either closed or are losing business and money. That is what A. A. A. has done to cotton.

Western wheat farmers welcome Government checks in return for partial idleness, but the public is furnishing the money. Wheat is being imported, despite the high tariff.

A. A. A. had an idea that there were too many hogs in the land, and it started out on a gigantic slaughtering expedition. Result, importations in quantities of fresh pork. In March of last year we brought in 2,811 pounds; in March of 1935 more than 1,000,000 pounds. And what price is the householder paying for pork chops? Consult the family budget.

The Government spent upwards of $1,000,000—the figures come from the Treasury Department—in reducing cattle herds. Result, in the whole year of 1934 we imported 57,677 head, whereas in January and February of this year alone we have imported 43,566.

Formerly we raised plenty of corn with an export market, but we purchased abroad—still the Treasury figures—3,713,035 bushels in the first 2 months of 1935. Oats? In bushels, 3,762,014. Tallow? In pounds, 31,615,534.

And what about butter? Because we have killed off so many cows, we have had to go elsewhere to piece out our supply. In January and February last there came to our shores and over our borders 3,609,588 pounds, valued at $845,231. And the importation of foodstuffs is constantly rising.

Oh, yes; a truly wonderful machine is A. A. A., and marvelous are the theoretical gentlemen who operate it.

Notwithstanding those facts taken from the Treasury report, the President calls those persons, who criticize the A. A. A., liars.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. From what publication has the Senator just read the article?

Mr. HASTINGS. The Philadelphia Inquirer.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is a great agricultural paper published in Philadelphia!

Mr. HASTINGS. The Senator knows of the newspaper, I assume. I do. However, no one disputes the facts, so far as I know.

Mr. President, while the President was making that speech, or about that same time, his chief pet, Mr. Richberg, was making another speech, and I think Senators will be interested to know what Mr. Richberg was saying to the 1,500 employees of the N. R. A.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. I object to the reading of Richberg's speech, because it reflects upon the motives of myself and the other 93 Senators.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I will not wait for a ruling on the point of order. However, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Louisiana to what Mr. Richberg said about what the Senate did unanimously on yesterday without a single dissenting vote when it passed the N. R. A. bill with certain modifications, extending it 9 months. Mr. Richberg said of it:

It was complete folly.

Not only that but he described the fundamental concepts of the N. R. A. as being so sound that only confused, muddled minds could attack it.

Mr. President, of course, it is impossible for us here in the Senate to meet the conditions imposed upon us by an administration which is run by a man like that. I might say in passing that in my judgment the N. R. A. is on its way out, and Donald Richberg is more responsible for its being on its way out than any other single individual in America. There was real merit in parts of the N. R. A. if its functions had been properly carried out and if it were legal—I have always doubted whether it was legal—but all of us who heard the story before the committee believed and reached the definite conclusion that 90 percent of the mistakes made in the N. R. A. were made by the administration forces. Yet, notwithstanding that record, this man dares to say to the group of 1,500 N. R. A. employees, at the time the President was attacking those who were complaining about the A. A. A., that what the Senate of the United States did was pure folly and that the Senators had muddled minds.

Mr. President, I just wished to make those observations, because I am not accustomed to permit people to call me names such as that without resenting it and giving voice to my resentment when I get a chance.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I would not again burden the Senate at this moment with any observations from me on this subject were it not for the fact that the able Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] has found it agreeable to make me the object of an allusion, referring to a speech I made this morning on this floor touching the speech of the President referred to by the Senator from Delaware.

The Senator from Delaware proceeds to leave the intimation in this body—and I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Delaware, as I have an idea he would like to hear what I am saying—

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I am not missing a word.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from Delaware, recognized as an eminent leader of his party, and the complete voice of stricture whenever such is required to serve party uses, and in many respects the most talented of the satirists, and who, rising to the effulgence of his capacity, supreme as it is, if desired by his colleagues, and, of course, ever rewarded by the smiles of their approval, could not lose the opportunity when this privilege was afforded him this morning of participating in a bit of practice which no doubt he expects to continue in a more excellent form and more continuously in the coming months before his honored constituents.

We pause to ask ourselves, To what did the able Senator allude? He first said that the President of the United States, departing from his standards, has in some wise violated some ethical procedure by alluding to those who have been heretofore characterizing the President himself as that which they were—liars—and because he having used the expression, he had descended beneath the dignity which the robes of his office would have required him to respect. I take it the able Senator meant to indicate that a remark of this kind, where there was no proof, was incorrect procedure. Yet I gather from the Senator's continuing observations he meant to assert that the criticism of the whole policy of the President in all things, whether by editors or by orators eminent as himself, or less, in quantity or quality, nevertheless was justified. Therefore, being justified, anybody who should make an allusion to them adversely would be calling them liars.

But, Mr. President, at this point I am greatly arrested by the thought that the able Senator tenders a resolution here which calls upon the Secretary of Agriculture please to inform this body why these farmers have assembled here in Washington; what is the meaning of their presence; to what extent, if he knows, their expenses have been paid; and who it is that has lured them by some seductive suggestion of reward in some form to assemble upon the grass in front of the White House in acceptance of the President's invitation, where he might address his farmer countrymen through these delegates.

The able Senator, following the submission of his resolution, leaves the intimation that from some sources will naturally come some information as to those who have besought these gentlemen by some method, sir, either of present financial emolument or the prospect of some future reward, to come here to the city; and we gather that such reward, if it is to be paid at all, is to be paid out of a fund which the able Senator, in his resolution, indicates exists.

Now I submit to the able Senator, if he were to appear in a courtroom or in this honorable body in denial of a slander upon himself, addressing on the Senate floor here his constituency at home, and there were those who intimated that he had come because he had been paid to arrive and that somewhere there was some reward waiting him for that which he was saying and for what he is doing, how quickly would he exclaim, "Oh, the array of liars!"

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have not read the resolution which has been offered by the Senator from Delaware but am I correct in assuming that it only deals with this assembly of farmers on the south side of the White House yesterday?

Mr. LEWIS. I must answer my able friend that, as I caught the reading of the resolution, it seemed to deal with those who assembled, whether they assembled on the south side or the north side I am unable to say, but I note that the disturbance in the bosom of my able friend from Delaware is that they assembled for and on the right side. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. I was anxious to know whether the resolution covered a similar inquiry with respect to the meeting of the United States Chamber of Commerce a few days ago, which met on the opposite side of the White House from that occupied by the farmers yesterday, and which adopted some resolutions which I have not heard our distinguished friend from Delaware criticize up to this date.

Mr. LEWIS. I was about to allude to that, sir, and I appreciate the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky.

I remind my honorable friend from Delaware that his clear intimation—contained in the resolution that these men have been paid to come to the city and that somewhere there is a reward for their presence, is made at a place where none of these men can answer, where none of them are allowed to speak, and where, in the very nature of things, the President of the United States can have no knowledge of the attack of the Senator because the President would hardly descend to recognize it in view of the conditions under which it has been delivered to the Senate. The men to whom it alludes have no place in this body to reply, and the Secretary of Agriculture can only answer, if at all, providing the resolution itself is approved by the Senate as properly being addressed to him. I ask my able friend does he not recognize that the resolution tendered by him, coming from one so high in authority in his party as well as from one so high in this honorable assemblage as himself becomes an intimation to the public that he must have some knowledge that these men have had their expenses paid; that they have been lured to come here, in appearance to give applause and approval to the President's action, and that their attitude here is one that has been purchased by some form. If the able Senator has no knowledge on such questions, an intimation of that kind, when properly read, comes within the designation used by the President in his speech, which was a little less than the expression used by Horace Greeley in retort to similar intimations of slander—

You lie, you villain, you lie!

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to my friend from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator said that the farmers were on the "right side" of the White House.

Mr. LEWIS. I hope so; I assume so.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And the Senator from Kentucky said that the chamber of commerce met on the opposite side. Does either Senator imply, in view of the remarks of the Senator from Illinois, that the chamber of commerce met on the "left." [Laughter.] I am prompted to ask the Senator that question, because when I first came to the Senate Senators were talking of right and wrong, and now they are talking of "right" and "left."

Mr. LEWIS. I may answer the able Senator and say, so far as I am concerned, I observed that the honorable body called "chamber of commerce", assembled, and I observed the resolution they adopted referred to by the Senator from Kentucky. I do not know who paid the expenses of the members when they arrived here; I do not know what particular potent force in this Republic induced them to come or seduced them to the slanders contained in their resolutions. I answer my able friend from Minnesota, and say I do not know whether they are "right" or whether they are "left", but whatever they left was not "right" and what they left has not been regarded anywhere as "right." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I again invite the able Senator from Delaware to regard the effect his resolution and its intimations will have upon the American mind; that is, that somewhere there must have been some conduct that suggested a fund for the purchasing of these men to come here and some inducement from some source that caused their visit to the President, and that the President was aware of what he must have known to be a conspiracy to bring these gentlemen here for the purposes of their visit. Since the able Senator has no information to justify such an intimation, I ask him does he not realize that that is the very impression his resolution will create upon the public mind? Since that is clearly the intimation, I ask the Senator now, has he any information anywhere to justify him in making the intimation contained in his resolution? If so, will he please now reveal the information and its source?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, in answer to that question, I desire to say that I have no knowledge except the general attitude of this administration upon that and like subjects. I am satisfied that this administration has in the past used money appropriated for public purposes to produce an effect upon the country that the administration was doing greater things than it was actually doing. I am surprised that anybody should at this moment, at this late day, raise any question about it. It has been the practice so long that I think I am correct in assuming that it is a fact—and I am seeking to find out by this resolution definitely whether I can get an admission from the Secretary of Agriculture to that effect.

With respect to being an insult to the Department, it cannot be; that is the farthest thing from my mind; but these farmers have been receiving under Secretary Wallace this year and last year and year before last large sums of money for doing nothing. Certainly if that be true, it would be no hardship on them and no reflection upon them if I should charge—which I do not do definitely, because I do not know definitely—that they are being paid money to come to Washington to see this great President who has been doing these great things for them. I say if I actually charged that, certainly they would not be insulted; it would be no reflection upon people who have been getting money from this great President for doing nothing. I do not see that I have reflected upon them at all, and I am sorry that my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] has put any such interpretation as that upon the resolution under the circumstances.

Mr. LEWIS. I recognize the abnegation of my eminent friend and the withdrawal by him of all the intimations he intended to cast upon the President and upon the country, and I would that his apology had been thought of before he had allowed this resolution to be presented under his authority. When the able Senator says he has no knowledge save a very general knowledge upon this subject, I must answer that if he has no more special knowledge as to that then he has general knowledge as to the righteousness of the President; it indicates that he has no knowledge of any kind nor of any nature touching the President or what he is doing.

But my able friend says that all he knows is that "for a long time" the "passing out of money" in different directions has been the custom. Since the administration has only been in power a little more than 2 years, then "the long time" that my eminent friend knows about must have been under his own administrations and, of course, he would have complete knowledge as to them; but it does not mean anything of the kind has prevailed as to the present administration. So, I consent to accept his confession as to the administrations of his party purchasing those who came to praise their efforts and applaud their schemes; but as to us, I accept his announcement now that he has no proof whatsoever, but tenders a resolution which I insist is an unhappy intimation of affront to these farmers who honestly came to seek relief for their people and present their petition of grievances and to receive the welcome of the President of the United States. The President invited them to the White House grounds as his guests, as he invited those to whom my eminent friend from Kentucky made reference, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, likewise, to visit him and accept the courtesy of the White House.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President—

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. The skepticism, the suspicion, and the agnosticism of the Senator from Delaware are not difficult to understand. During the period when his party was in control of the country the farmers did not make enough money to enable them to save sufficient to come to Washington, but now that they are receiving prices that enable them to get away from their farms, and beyond the county line, they are able to come to Washington whenever they see fit, for whatever purpose may bring them here. The Senator from Delaware ought not to be held accountable for the fact that he is not sufficiently up to date to realize that fact.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, repelling the Delaware Senator's allusion to these farmers and the accusation that they really came here under the sway of money that had been advanced from source to bring them here, leaving the intimation that such money must have come from the Public Treasury as a compensation, and that the hand that had drawn it forth from the Treasury was the hand necessarily of an injudicious robber—for such person would have to use the public funds without authority—let me remind the Senator that, while it may be, as the able Senator intimates, that there has gone forth money from the Government to aid these farmers in distress, such as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] has alluded to, it was in the process of ordered and orderly government.

The able Senator from Delaware, as chairman of the senatorial committee of his eminent party, my distinguished rival, as I hold the similar position within my own party, has frequently held forth to the country, and during the campaign of 1934, both by speech and through the press, asserted that the relief money which was being paid then to the farmers, to these producers, was in the form of a bribe for votes and was used in purchasing votes.

This slander which this eminent able leader of his party at that time left upon the American mind as against the people was responded to by the people at the election, and when the ballots were counted it was found that they had repudiated the affront and had returned to the United States Senate and House of Representatives the largest majority of one party representatives ever known to political parties, certainly since the Civil War. I ask my friend from that lesson has he not learned that similar intimations, such as made in this resolution, are likely to bring upon him and his party similar crisis? I ask him to consider if these honorable men, the guests of the President, would not scorn the intimation made against the President and themselves, and that they would not highly regard him who has left upon them the affront and the slander which now will attach to them in view of this resolution being offered by a Senator of the United States.

I take it the able Senator is correct. He did not mean to leave that impression—and since he said it was not his intent, I suggest but one other duty upon his part, and that is to withdraw the resolution and confess the affront regrettably by withdrawing his resolution, and thus make amends to these people, to the President, and to the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I have secured a copy of the resolution introduced by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS]. I have been interested in his disavowal of his resolution in his colloquy with the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

Let us see what the Senator from Delaware wants to do. He does not have any "whereases" in his resolution, and I am surprised at that. The resolution reads:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and is hereby, requested to furnish to the Senate any and all correspondence in his Department touching the gathering of some three or four thousand farmers in the city of Washington during the last 2 or 3 days; whether any instructions had been given by him, or any person in his Department, or any of the various county agents or farm organizations receiving Federal aid, with respect to getting these farmers to come to Washington; how the particular group was selected and by whom; and the purpose of having the said farmers come to Washington at this particular time; and

Resolved further, That the Secretary of Agriculture give to the Senate all information in his possession with respect to any cost borne by the Federal Government directly or indirectly in meeting the expenses of the farmers gathered as aforesaid.

Mr. President, how any Senator can give any consideration to that resolution except to conclude that it is a direct reflection on all the farmers who came to Washington, I cannot conceive. The intimation is that because several thousand farmers have come to Washington at this particular time there is some sinister or some corrupt or some secret motive or cause underlying their visit.

I wish to say to the Senator from Delaware that there are about 700 farmers here from my own State. I have been in contact with a great many of them since they have been here. If it will at all enlighten the Senator, if he will give any credence to secondary evidence, I desire to say to him that the farmers from Texas who are here have told me that their expenses were paid by the farmers contributing in each county and each locality 50 cents or a dollar each, and after the money was contributed the local organizations elected certain delegates to represent the county to come with this delegation to Washington—to come for what?

They are not coming demanding favors, as so often the constituents of the Senator from Delaware come, but they have come to Washington in order that the country may know that they appreciate the fact that the present administration, of all the administrations we have had in recent times, has somewhat vindicated its campaign promises to agriculture and has had a real farm program.

That is the head and front of their offending, if there be such. The head and the front of the offending of these farmers in coming to Washington has been that they have come to the Capital City, where the Government sits, to express their gratitude and appreciation, not for something that is expected in the future, but for the fact that the Government has dealt fairly with them in the past.

For that cause they come, and the Senator from Delaware by his resolution proceeds to smear them over with suspicion; he must daub them all about with the implication that they have been subsidized to come here; that there is some political motive back of their coming. They have come from practically every State in the Union. I dare say there are farmers here from Delaware. I dare say they came at their own expense. I dare say the farmers from Delaware did not come at the expense of the Chamber of Commerce of Delaware.

Senators, the ridiculous features of the resolution of the Senator from Delaware are revealed when we stop to think a moment. When did the Senator from Delaware ever introduce a resolution of inquiry to find out who paid the expenses, as suggested by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], of the chambers of commerce who came here? The Senator from Delaware does not want to know about that because he already knows why they came. He knows they came, perhaps paying their expenses with their own money, for a selfish and greedy purpose. He knew they came either to obtain more favors from the Government or to try to prevent someone else being accorded some consideration at the hands of the Government; so he does not inquire about the chambers of commerce. He knows why they came.

Does the Senator from Delaware inquire why the lobbyists come and who pay the expenses of the lobbyists who beset us in the corridors from time to time and appear before our committees? No. He knows who pays their expenses. He knows that the Secretary of Agriculture does not pay them; so he does not ask the Secretary of Agriculture if he paid the expenses of any of the lobbyists.

I am wondering if the Senator from Delaware ever inquired who paid the expenses of the munition makers who hang around the Navy Department and the War Department? I wonder if he ever inquired who pays their expenses? No. He knows who pays their expenses. He knows that the munition makers and their masters pay their own expenses. Why? Because they think it is a good investment to pay a little expense now in order to obtain great profit later on.

I wonder if the Senator from Delaware, who comes from a shipping State, has ever inquired by resolution or otherwise who pays the expenses of the representatives of the shipping interests who hang around the Merchant Marine Committee of the House and the Commerce Committee of the Senate, and who crowd the corridors and lobbies of the Shipping Board and the Department of Commerce? Who pays their expenses when they come to Washington? The Senator from Delaware does not inquire. He already knows.

But it is different when some farmers come here, most of whom have never before been to Washington, most of whom were delighted at the opportunity to come to their capital city for the first time, and were glad to come as delegates, not representing some cold corporate interest, but representing their own fellow citizens, their own farmer neighbors, who out of their meager earnings were willing to contribute 50 cents or $1 or $1.50 in order to send delegates here; not to go back with their grips full of loot, not to go back with their trunks crammed with favors, not to go back with the blood of our sons on their hands in the form of profits to munition makers, and with ship subsidies of all kinds. When they come simply to say to the Government, "We come here representing the farmers of America to say to you that we are grateful for what you have already done", then the Senator's feelings of sublimated purity, his rarefied emotions of fear that somebody is going to "put something over" on the Government, become so agitated, so aroused that he boldly proclaims that some malevolent movement is going to be undertaken against the interests of the Government. We must find out who brought these dangerous people to Washington. [Laughter.] Whence comes the great subsidy that bought a reduced-rate railroad ticket for a round trip, limited to 4 days? Who is it that is making it possible for this embattled group of farmers to come to the National Capital? What business have they here? Let them go back to the farms where they ought to stay! What right have they to come to Washington?

It is true that the Senator from Delaware had no idea that any farmer had enough money to journey to Washington [laughter], and he did not under Mr. Hoover and under the benevolent administration of the Senator from Delaware; so they had to take up assessments. Most of these farmers had to come here through the bounty and through the favor of their own neighbors and citizens. I am not speaking for the other States. The rumor and the story circulating among all the farmers I have contacted are that that is the way they all came; but I know how the farmers from Texas came to Washington. The Senators from Texas are not afraid to have their farmer constituents come up and see them, and see how they are performing their duties. I marvel that the Senator from Delaware is afraid to have the farmers from Delaware come to Washington. Why should they not come here?

Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware wants all the correspondence in the Department of Agriculture about this trip. Of course, we all know what the motive of the Senator is. The Senator is the chairman of the Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee, and he has what I consider the very foolish idea that by attacking the farmers through Secretary Wallace he can gain some political advantage. I do not concede it to be a sound policy, however, even in behalf of the Republicans, to attack the entire agricultural population of our Nation for the sake of gaining a few votes among chambers of commerce.

The Senator probably already has the chambers of commerce, or a large part of them, rounded up, and he has already proved his subserviency to them. It was not necessary for him again to come forth and denounce the farmers to ingratiate himself with the chambers of commerce, or at least with the United States Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. President, this resolution cannot be viewed in any other light than as a practical insult to the delegation of farmers who have come to Washington. It implies a crime. It implies that somebody has violated the law. It implies that the Secretary of Agriculture has embezzled the funds of the United States, because, so far as I know, we have passed no law authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture, or anybody else, to pay the railroad fare and expenses of delegations of farmers to come to Washington. So, the resolution implies that the Secretary of Agriculture has embezzled the funds of the United States, and it also implies that the farmers who have come here are parties to that criminal act, and that they and the Secretary of Agriculture have conspired together to rob the Treasury of the United States.

How else can the resolution be construed? No other construction is possible. The Senator from Delaware does not charge, it is true, but the implication is there that some persons, without warrant of law, in violation of the statute, against all canons of integrity and of honest and fair dealing, have conspired to rob the Treasury of the United States. So, evidently, according to the attitude of the Senator from Delaware, all of the three or four thousand farmers who have come to Washington from all parts of the Union are under suspicion; and if he had his way he would probably send them to the Federal grand jury for investigation to see whether or not they have in fact defrauded the Government of public funds.

Mr. President, this is one of the most unheard-of and unusual and remarkable documents to be introduced in the Senate that has ever come within my knowledge. I cannot understand the motives of the Senator from Delaware. Can it be that he has lost his political bearings? Can it be that he has lost his sense of direction, that he has lost his sense of orientation? I am afraid that in his desperate state of mind, in his wandering in the political woods now for more than 2 years, he has lost his sense of proportion. I caution him as a friend—not a political friend, but as a personal friend—to get a grip on himself and not allow himself to be swept away by these fatuous, alluring, fantastic things that might lead him into the bog.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I desire to ask the Senator from Texas if he will not ask unanimous consent to have the resolution voted upon immediately.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. LONG. I object.

Mr. CONNALLY. In fairness to the Senator from Delaware, I think he ought to hear what has been said. The Senator from South Carolina has suggested that the Senator from Texas ask unanimous consent for immediate consideration and for a vote on the resolution.

Mr. HASTINGS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LONG. I object.

Mr. CONNALLY. I make that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas for immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CONNALLY. For an immediate vote upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For an immediate vote upon the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. LONG. I object.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me—

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I desire to ask the Senator from Delaware whether he is willing to have an immediate vote on the resolution.

Mr. HASTINGS. I assumed that there would be no objection to the resolution.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator who submits the resolution asks for a vote upon it. The Senator from Texas asks for a vote upon it.

Mr. HASTINGS. I assume that there will be no objection by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], or anybody else. I have merely asked the Secretary of Agriculture, which is nothing unusual, to furnish to the Senate information with respect to a certain public matter; that is all.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WAGNER. If an immediate vote should be ordered by the Senate, would that in any way affect the unfinished business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would not.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President—

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. May I ask if there was any objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CONNALLY. What does the RECORD show as to who objected?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] interposed an objection to the request of the Senator.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I do not want this political faux pas to get in the way of the Wagner labor bill. Let us go on with the Wagner labor bill and then bring up this resolution.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] is perfectly willing to have a vote taken now on the resolution. Has the Senator from Louisiana taken charge of the Wagner bill?

Mr. LONG. If there is no debate to be had, nothing except a plain vote, I have no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY. That was my request.

Mr. BYRNES and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be voted upon without debate.

Mr. LONG. All right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the resolution be voted upon without debate. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. McNARY. The resolution has been read, and it properly should follow the usual parliamentary procedure—lie on the table and come up at some future day in the morning hour.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the author of the resolution asks for a vote at this time, may I ask the Senator from Oregon if he will not permit the resolution to be voted upon?

Mr. McNARY. That does not alter the case at all.

Mr. HASTINGS. I did not ask that.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator from Oregon objects to a vote upon the resolution at this time?

Mr. McNARY. I have stated my proposition. The resolution has been read. It goes over for the day under the rule. It remains on the table. At an appropriate time, when we have a morning hour and the calendar is considered, it may come up.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator from Oregon certainly understands the resolution. It has been debated. It is easily understood, and the Senate is ready to vote upon it. Will not the Senator from Oregon withdraw the objection, and let us vote?

Mr. McNARY. I insist on my objection.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon objects. The Senator from Texas has the floor.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I very much regret that the Senator from Oregon interposed an objection to immediate consideration of the resolution. I thought the Senator from Delaware was so close to the councils of the minority leadership that if he really wanted any information, and was so anxious to get it, we could have an immediate vote, and his sleuths could be out by sundown with their searchlights and their other detective paraphernalia, before these farmers leave town, and they could search them and see if they have anything left on them. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Visitors in the galleries must not show signs of approval or disapproval. They are here as guests of the Senate, and may remain only so long as they observe the rules of the Senate.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HASTINGS. I assumed that there would be no objection. Perhaps the Senator from Oregon concluded that there was about to be an objection. When the request was made, I assumed that it was to adopt the resolution. If it was to kill the resolution, I should not want that done. I should like to talk about the resolution for a while.

Mr. CONNALLY. All we asked was a vote.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the Senators on the other side of the Chamber are satisfied to adopt the resolution, very well; but if those on the other side of the Chamber are not going to let the Senate have the information requested in the resolution we will let it go over until some other day, and discuss it a little while longer.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, my recollection was that when the Senator from Delaware presented the resolution earlier in the day he asked for its immediate consideration, and upon the suggestion of some Member on the floor of the Senate it was proposed to have it go over until tomorrow.

Mr. HASTINGS. No; I did not make any such request. I merely asked that the resolution be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, of course, the Senator from Delaware assumes an impregnable position when he says that he is perfectly willing to agree if we do everything he wants done.

Mr. HASTINGS. Why does the Senator from Texas object if there is nothing contained in the resolution which reflects upon the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. CONNALLY. There is something in the resolution which reflects on him.

Mr. HASTINGS. Is the Senator from Texas afraid of the facts? Is that what is the matter with him?

Mr. CONNALLY. No.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then, let us adopt the resolution, and let us get the facts.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is what we want to do.

Mr. HASTINGS. Do you want to adopt it, or to kill it?

Mr. CONNALLY. We want to vote on it. We want to vote on the resolution. If the Senate votes it up, very well; if it votes it down, very well. I am only one Member of the Senate.

Mr. HASTINGS. How is the Senator from Texas going to vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. HASTINGS. Is the Senator going to vote for the resolution, or is he not?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas is ready to vote now.

Mr. HASTINGS. For the resolution, or against it?

Mr. CONNALLY. I want to vote. Does the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the Senator want to vote against the resolution?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will answer the Senator's question.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then answer my question, and I will know what the Senator's position is.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator is a very shrewd man. He wants everyone to promise in advance that he will vote for his resolution, and if one says "Yes", then he will let it come up, but if one says that he is not going to vote for it, then the Senator objects to it coming up, although it is his own resolution. It is his own baby, but he disowns it if anybody does not kiss it. [Laughter.]

If we could get an immediate vote on the resolution, and the Senate should adopt, as the Senate has a right to do, the Senator from Delaware would, of course, be appointed chairman of the investigating committee, and then before tonight's sun went down he could have all his sleuths, his investigating experts, and his heavy artillery, and the munitions that Delaware produces, if need be, and he could seize these farmers before they leave. Some of them will not leave until 6 or 7 o'clock tonight. He could search them.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. In a moment. He could search them. He could go through them and find out whether they had on them any letters from the Department of Agriculture. He could look through them and see whether or not the Washington hotels had left them with a thin dime. [Laughter.]

And he could trace the money, perhaps, through the Treasury and discover whether it did, in fact, come out of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. The Senator has read the resolution, has read it to the Senate, and he knows it makes no such provision for an investigation by anybody. It is merely a resolution asking the Secretary of Agriculture to send to the Senate what information he has upon a certain subject. Why try to mislead people by misstating what the resolution provides?

Mr. CONNALLY. I know what it provides.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then why say something else? Why say that it provides for something it does not contemplate? The President used a very nasty word with respect to such a practice.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let us see whether the Senator from Delaware means what he says. He says that all he wants by this resolution is to get a statement from the Secretary of Agriculture as to whether or not the Department furnished any money. Did he not say that?

Here is the morning paper, the Washington Herald, which the Senator from Delaware always reads, or ought to. [Laughter.] It says this:

A. A. A. Administrator Chester C. Davis categorically denied reports that departmental county agents had inspired the meeting, and Chester H. Day, leader of the demonstrators from Hale County, Tex., said the march "just grew like wildfire" and within 3 weeks brought the crowd into Washington, despite there was no organization, no money, and no planning.

If all the Senator from Delaware wants is a statement from the Department of Agriculture, he already has it. He had it before he offered his resolution.

Let us see. The Senator from Delaware is a great economist; he does not believe in spending Government money. All he wants is to have the Secretary of Agriculture tell him that the Secretary did not furnish any money to these farmers. Here he is taking up a great portion of the time of the Senate today with a resolution, when he could have telephoned the Secretary of Agriculture in 3 minutes. He has secretaries who get other people on the telephone. It would have delayed the Senator from Delaware just long enough to pick up the receiver and say, "Hello. This is the Senator from Delaware, chairman of the Republican Executive Campaign Committee. Is this Secretary Wallace?"

"This is Secretary Wallace."

"Mr. Secretary, did you furnish, directly or indirectly, any money to bring these farmers to Washington?"

The Secretary would have said, "No", and the soul of the Senator from Delaware would have been, he says, in peace; but, in fact, I think it would have been in a great state of disturbance, because he would not have had this opportunity to make a field day of this great crime.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Texas has already covered what was in my mind; a private conversation of that sort between the Republican chairman and the Secretary of Agriculture would have gotten no headlines in the newspapers.

Mr. CONNALLY. Not if they kept it secret. It would not have gotten any headline, it would not have gotten into the RECORD, and he could not have franked it out to the people of Delaware. It is impossible to frank out a verbal conversation. It must be placed in the RECORD. No newspaperman is going to send in for a Senator and take him out to the President's room and talk to him about a private conversation about which he knows nothing. But if a Senator offers a resolution, that commands the attention of the correspondents. There is news in the air.

"Administration circles are rocked by the Hastings resolution."

"Hastings resolution creates great political furor."

"Wall Street tickers begin to record disturbance on the stock market."

[Laughter.]

"Great national scandal. Farmer caught with a dollar and a half in his pocket."

[Laughter.]

"Great suspicion that it came from the Department of Agriculture."

"It is well known in informed circles that the same farmer in 1932 did not have a red cent. [Laughter.] He now has $1.50, and it is believed that the money can be traced, at least indirectly, to the Treasury of the United States."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In view of the rains which have occurred in the West in the last few days, does the Senator suppose that the object of this resolution is to create another dust storm?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to the Senator that if there is any Senator in this body who can create an intellectual dust storm, the Senator from Delaware is the man. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, since we cannot vote on the resolution, since the Senator's own organization on the other side of the aisle are trying to suppress this wonderful resolution, since his own leader, having better judgment than has the Senator from Delaware in political matters, knowing a great deal better how this foolish resolution is going to strike the country, says, "Senator, do not inflict this on us. Do not let us vote on this resolution of the Senator from Delaware." Will not the Senator between now and tomorrow at noon, when the Senate shall meet, call the Secretary of Agriculture? He certainly would not doubt the integrity of the Secretary if the Secretary told him he did not give any money to these farmers. Will he not call Mr. Chester Davis and ascertain the facts, and save the Senate and the country from this great hubbub? Why does he not get his party to have a conference tomorrow before the meeting of the Senate?

Mr. HASTINGS. The Senator from Texas has made more hubbub about this matter than has anybody else in his effort to try to prevent me from getting the desired information. Let the Senator from Texas get it for me and deliver it to me in the morning.

Mr. CONNALLY. Here it is in the newspaper now. The Senator does not want it.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is from Mr. Davis.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me ask the Senator a question. If the Senator from Texas secures a written statement, or a verbal statement, from the Secretary of Agriculture before tomorrow noon, will the Senator drop his resolution?

Mr. HASTINGS. If he will answer the questions asked in the resolution.

Mr. CONNALLY. If! If! A moment ago the Senator from Delaware said that if I would get a statement from the Secretary of Agriculture he would let up. Now he is putting a lot of "ifs" in it.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want answers to the question which I have asked. I do not want the Secretary's interpretation. I want him to give me the facts.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator will call him over the telephone he will not only get answers to all his questions—

Mr. HASTINGS. Let the Senator get them for me, and save me the trouble.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not the Senator's secretary. I am glad to accommodate the Senator wherever possible. The Senator from Texas has been here only a short time. He tries to observe the ancient and honorable rules of this body and the rules of courtesy toward Senators, but, frankly, I do not regard it as quite within the compulsion of those canons of conduct for one Senator to ask another Senator to perform a task that is considered to be one for secretaries, or telephone operators, or attachés about the office. I do not think it is quite fair for one Senator to ask another to perform such a service for him.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Let the Senator's secretary call Mr. Wallace, or let his doorkeeper or someone else call the Secretary, and then talk to the Senator.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas is shedding crocodile tears about this resolution when he could leave the floor now and in a few minutes get me the information, which would be a lot less trouble than making this speech and trying to amuse the galleries with it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator that I will be willing to excuse him right now, and while I am finishing my remarks he can go out and get the Secretary on the telephone and settle the matter before I conclude.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. In a moment. The Senator from Delaware has referred to the Senator from Texas as stirring up a hubbub, as he says. The Senator from Texas may have had something to do with the hub, but most of it was the hub furnished by the Senator from Delaware. [Laughter.]

I now yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have not heard all this discussion—

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator ought to be thankful.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But I desire to ask the Senator from Texas if the Senator from Delaware has included in his resolution the investigation of the recent statement of the United States Chamber of Commerce?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to the Senator that that has been adverted to heretofore, and I think the RECORD fails to show that there has been any concern or any effort on the part of the Senator from Delaware to secure information on that point.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. For the information of the Senator from Alabama, I should like to inform him that my information is that there are 700 people from Texas in the Senate gallery.

Mr. CONNALLY. Not that many.

Mr. HASTINGS. And the Senator from Texas is trying to put on a show for them. That is the information which has come to me.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to know what kind of a show the Senator from Delaware is putting on.

Mr. CONNALLY. I think it is ungracious for the Senator from Delaware to attack the Senator from Texas because once in a lifetime some of the constituents of the Senator from Texas have visited Washington. When they do come to Washington they want to see the sights. They look at the Library of Congress; they look at the Washington Monument; they want to come up to the Senate and see the curiosities here. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I merely desire to suggest that if there were 700 people in the Senate galleries from Delaware, there would not be anybody left in that State.

Mr. CONNALLY. I think it is ungracious of the Senator from Delaware to attack the Senator from Texas for making a few remarks on an occasion of this kind, when he says there are 700 Texans in the gallery. Of course, there are not that many. There may be some Texans in the galleries, and I hope there are. I want the people from Texas to see, now and then, with what the Senator from Texas has to contend in the Senate. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The Senator from Delaware is more blessed than is the Senator from Texas. When in Washington he lives only a short distance from his tiny State—tinier geographically than any other State but one, I believe—while mine covers more square miles of territory than any other State in the Union. But he lives nearby, and I dare say that not a day passes but that the Senator from Delaware may rear back with an expansive smile and beam on some constituent in the gallery. There is not a day when we are in session, no doubt, but that happens.

The Senator knows they are here; he knows when they are here; he knows why they are here; he knows what they are trying to take back with them when they come here. Yet because some of my farmers, who probably never have been to Washington before in their lives, come to Washington and visit the galleries, because they have the hardihood to sit in the galleries and view the proceedings here, the Senator from Delaware says the Senator from Texas is "putting on a show", when, if it had not been for the fact that the Senator from Delaware, ungracious host that he is, attacked the guests of the Government here in the gallery by a resolution reflecting upon their integrity, poking fun at them, and smearing them all over with suspicion, there would have been no occasion for the Senator from Texas to take the floor at all.

Mr. NEELY rose.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, does the Senator from Texas admit that these farmers came here as guests of the Government?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the Senator from Texas admit that these farmers came here as guests of the Government?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas means that anybody who is in the gallery is a guest of the Senate. I said "the Government." This is a part of the Government under Democratic rule. [Laughter in the galleries.] I said that they are here as our guests. Of course the Senator from Texas did not mean that they came here all the way from Texas as the guests of the Government, and the Senator from Delaware knew that the Senator from Texas did not mean that.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is what the Senator said.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Delaware reminds me of a sharp pettifogging—I will not say politician, but statesman, in making that kind of an insinuation.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. I protest that the able Senator from Texas is not dealing generously with the senior Senator from Delaware—the State that is a little larger than a postage stamp. The Senator from Delaware was an important part of the Hoover administration. During that administration the World War veterans came here, just as the farmers recently came here from Texas and various other States. Mr. Hoover called out the Army, and with bayonets and bombs the veterans were driven out of Washington. The Senator from Texas ought to be thankful that the Senator from Delaware does not demand that war be waged against the farmers.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator from West Virginia for that contribution to the debate. Of course, I do not really, sincerely believe that the Senator from Delaware wants to call out the Army to evict the farmers. When the ex-soldiers came here everybody knew they did not have any money. They came without any funds whatever. I do not think the Senator from Delaware would want to eject these farmers from the city until he knew that they did not have anything left.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to denounce this resolution as an unwarranted and unjustified and baseless reflection upon every farmer who has come to Washington, upon the Secretary of Agriculture, upon Chester C. Davis, the Agricultural Administrator, and everyone connected with the Department of Agriculture.

REGULATION OF PUBLIC-UTILITY HOLDING COMPANIES

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate briefly to the report from the Interstate Commerce Committee on the proposed Public Utilities Act of 1935, the bill known as the "holding-company bill." The committee has filed a very exhaustive report on this bill, setting forth the numerous changes in the bill as originally introduced, which were made by the committee, and also has set forth in its report a description of every paragraph in the bill, and what effect the proposed legislation will have upon the utilities industry as a whole. I especially call it to the attention of Senators, and ask them to read it, because there has been so much misinformation sent out with respect to the bill.

I expect to call up the bill for early consideration as soon as I possibly can have it considered by the Senate.

SHARE OUR WEALTH

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, about 4 weeks ago—will the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] give me his attention just a moment and then he can leave the Chamber if he wishes—about 4 weeks ago the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] made speeches over the radio in which they referred to the program and the plan which I have supported since I have been in Congress—the problem and the proposition to limit the wealth of the large fortune holders and to guarantee something to the smaller people.

The Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Kentucky both stated, as I read their remarks, that it would be impossible for me to draw legislation to cover the propositions I have submitted. Unfortunately both those Senators have not kept up with the proceedings of this body. Legislation had been drawn in the last session of Congress to cover practically everything proposed by this plan, but it has not been seen by the Senator from Kentucky or the Senator from Arkansas, or else they would not have asked the questions they did ask.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Kentucky saw the bill or resolution referred to by the Senator as having been introduced in the last Congress, which has not been introduced in this Congress, but, very far from setting out any plan, it was merely a resolution or a bill requesting the Finance Committee to do what he evidently could not do—draw a bill along the lines of his discussion. Moreover, neither then nor since did the Senator himself furnish the Finance Committee any draft of a measure from which the Finance Committee could begin to work, or, if it desired itself to initiate legislation on the subject, from which it might obtain any idea as to the Senator's proposition.

Mr. LONG. The Senator did not look far enough because there were bills drawn, as well as a resolution. There were bills drawn covering most of the things I have advocated. However, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] have rather sneeringly referred to the phrase "share our wealth." The Senator from North Carolina, amidst the smiles of the Senators from Kentucky and Arkansas, referred to the "share-our-wealth dog."

I desire to give them to understand where the "share-our-wealth" phrase was first used. I want them to understand that that "share-our-wealth" phrase did not come from the senior Senator from Louisiana, but was the phrase and promise of the present President of the United States in his acceptance speech delivered at the Chicago convention; and now, in order that I may start out right so that the Senators will understand what this whole thing is intended to effect, I will read from the President's acceptance speech at Chicago, page 383 of the Proceedings of the Democratic National Convention of 1932—and I am quoting Mr. Roosevelt:

Throughout the Nation—

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask for order. I am very anxious to hear what the Senator from Louisiana has to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let there be order in the Chamber.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is so seldom that we hear the Senator from Louisiana that I do not wish to miss anything.

Mr. LONG. I do not mind conversation, but I do not want my colleagues to go to the point in their conversation where I cannot hear myself talk. I talked so much on yesterday that I cannot talk very loud today.

Throughout the Nation, men and women, forgotten in the political philosophy of the Government of the last years look to us here for guidance and for more equitable opportunity to share—in the distribution of national wealth. [Applause and cheering.]

My friend from Kentucky was the keynoter of that convention. He forgot all about it and went on the radio to denounce "share-our-wealth" the other night. He has become disloyal to the party. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. No; not now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. LONG. I will yield in just a minute.

Mr. BARKLEY. It may be too late for me to answer what the Senator is saying now.

Mr. LONG. All right; go ahead, since I have been interrupted.

Mr. BARKLEY. I not only did not depart from the speech which I had the honor to make as temporary chairman of the convention, but I did not depart from the language of the President in accepting the nomination. I challenge the Senator from Louisiana or anybody else to place any such interpretation on that language as is indicated by his proposition about which he speaks so often and so vociferously.

Mr. LONG. I am coming to that!

"Share our wealth", "share our national wealth", "share in the distribution of wealth", were the phrases of Franklin D. Roosevelt when he accepted the nomination in Chicago. I want my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], my friend from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], and my friend from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]—and I have sent for the Senator from Arkansas, because I am replying to the charge he made against me in his radio speech at some gathering or some club or chamber of commerce or some other something where they send for Senators to speak to them and give some sum somewhere between $50 and $150 to listen to us. I want these friends of mine to realize when I first adopted that phrase for our organization. It is a pretty big organization in this country, Mr. President. It is in every State in the Union. It has thousands of members in every State. It has probably millions in some States, not counting, of course, that they may not all be voters. There may be many below the voting age. But the "share our wealth" phrase was the promise—yes; I said the "promise"—the "share our wealth" phrase was the promise of Franklin D. Roosevelt in the Chicago convention when he accepted the nomination.

It is true that men like the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from North Carolina have been denouncing everybody in the Senate and everywhere else who still advocates what the people were led to believe they were going to get by the promise made at the Chicago convention. Nonetheless there are a few of us who are still clinging to the tenets of that platform and the pledges made in that convention, beginning with the promise made by Franklin D. Roosevelt at that convention.

What is a platform for? What is a party promise for? What the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] ought to be out here doing, what the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] ought to be out here doing, is apologizing to the people for not having carried out that promise made at that convention, instead of trying to ridicule somebody because he is insisting upon that promise being carried out as made at that convention. Instead of doing that they are speaking over the radio, talking, I understand, in terms of denunciation of the proposal to redistribute wealth in this country, saying that it is dishonorable, praising the President with one breath and condemning with the next breath someone who insists upon the thing being done and the promise being kept, and at the same time condemning again someone who does not agree with them and the President for failing to keep the pledge made to the people at the Chicago convention.

There is the "share our wealth" declaration. So much for that.

A short time ago a New York daily newspaper decided it was going to prove that all these statements I had been making about the concentration of wealth in the hands of the few were not true; so they sent a man to Washington to investigate and see whether or not there was any need to redistribute wealth in the United States. The New York Daily News, I understand, has the largest circulation of any paper in the United States. I do not know whether that is true or not. I am told by some of my newspaper friends that the paper which I hold in my hand has the largest circulation of any paper in New York, this Daily News. It is owned by men who come from the millionaire and multimillionaire ranks. It is owned by the multimillionaire families.

The Daily News said that having heard a speech which I delivered in reply to Gen. Hugh Johnson, in which I said that 4 percent of the people owned 85 percent of the wealth and that 96 percent of the people of America live below the poverty line—this newspaper said that having heard that statement by me it was going to send its investigators to Washington, D. C., to prove that the statements I had made were false and untrue, and, like the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] said, like the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] said, and like the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] intimates, this newspaper was going to prove that this talk of HUEY P. LONG about the concentration of wealth and the necessity for the redistribution of wealth was untrue and impossible. So they sent their man down here. They say they sent one of the best economists and investigators there was in the United States. What did he do?

Here is the New York News and I am going to read from it. They made the investigation as they announced, to prove that what I said was untrue, to prove that such men as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] knew what he was talking about, and to prove that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] knew what he was talking about. They had some help and here is the help they got from the biggest paper in America.

I read from the New York Daily News of April 11, 1935. Here is the headline of this editorial.

This is an important editorial, especially for newspaper editors.

That is the headline.

When HUEY LONG in his "share the wealth" reply to General Johnson said that 1 percent of Americans own 59 percent of America's wealth, while 4 percent own between 85 percent and 95 percent of the wealth, we knew he was a liar.

They are using the President's word. [Laughter.]

In other words, said this newspaper, when I said that 1 percent owned 59 percent of the wealth, and 4 percent owned 85 percent, "we knew he was a liar."

I read on:

We intimated as much, and added that somebody ought to look into this question and get the true figures on American wealth distribution in order to refute this demagogue, LONG.

The News then assigned one of its most competent investigators, Lowell Limpus, to the job of digging up the figures. About Limpus' character and qualifications for such a job it should be recorded that he is not a sentimentalist, is not suffused, for instance, with the conviction that when a white-collar person loses his job he should be taken by the hand by a paternalistic government and taught eurythmic dancing. Limpus is a realist. He was a West Pointer, in fact, and West Pointers are not noted for their sentimentality toward the poor, the rich, or anybody else.

And so Lowell Limpus went to Washington and worked for weeks in the Library of Congress and elsewhere to root up the true figures with which to confound LONG.

The results of that research are now being published in the News. And to the consternation of many people (including ourselves when we first heard of them), the results of that research show that LONG had essentially the correct dope.

Now, get that. After all the cartoons you have been seeing, all the ridicule you have been seeing, all the calumny you have been seeing, and all the flannel-mouthed speeches over the radio by these distinguished men all over the country that all that HUEY P. LONG was saying was untrue, false, and ridiculous, and an appeal to passion and prejudice—after all that, here comes the biggest newspaper in the United States and says, "After weeks and months of investigation, we find that every living word that he says is correct."

Of course this is not going to convince the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. It would not do him any good. We do not expect it to do him any good. We have other ways of getting these reforms. If we waited for votes to come from men of conservative leaning, who never have been able to see the truth until it was too late, we should never hope for these reforms to come.

But I read further.

The results of that research show that LONG had essentially the correct dope. He was wrong in some details.

They say:

He was wrong in some details, and we still think HUEY LONG a dangerous little demagogue—

They say, "He has the facts all right. What he says is essentially true, but we are still afraid of him, because he is telling the truth about the thing"; but, none the less, they say it is so.

Now, wait until I go a little further:

But his assertions about where the money power is lodged in this country are substantially borne out by figures compiled and buried away from McKinley's time till now.

In other words, this paper wants it understood that it does not want to claim to be kinfolks with me, and I do not need to claim to be kinfolks with them. I do not need any newspaper myself. I can stay in office or out of office without one. Now, here is what they say:

The gist of the Limpus findings is this:

And they quote Limpus' findings:

More than 96 percent of the workers in the United States receive less than the $2,000 a year which is regarded as "sufficient only for basic necessities."

According to the United States Federal Trade Commission, in 1926, 1 percent of the people dying did own 59 percent of the wealth reported; and since that time the rich—

Get this:

And since that time—

Since 1926, when 1 percent of the people owned 59 percent of the wealth—since that time, says this paper—

Since that time the rich have been getting richer in proportion, and the poor poorer.

In other words, I have understated the truth. I have not stated it as bad as it is, according to this newspaper. My statement that 1 percent owned 59 percent of the wealth is not accurate. On the contrary, 1 percent own a great deal more than 59 percent; and still the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] have not yet seen the light. They have been in the Congress of the United States for 20 years—about that long, I guess—and if they were kept here 20 more years, until 15 men owned 99 percent, they never would be able to see what this thing is all about. They just simply were not brought up right to this kind of politics, and they never will be.

Mr. BARKLEY. Thank God! [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. I thank God for that myself. It has been my good political fortune to have blind men like these in politics. I have gone as far as I have, with my limited ability, due to the fact that my enemies had less foresight than I had. I have very little foresight, and they have less; but they are worse off than I am, for they have not even got hindsight. [Laughter.] They cannot see something after it has passed over them, and they have been knocked down by it half a dozen times.

I read on from this editorial:

When Limpus discovered that such was the picture of wealth distribution in the United States, he wired the News that his data would prove very startling, and that probably his findings could not be published.

Get that! When he found out that he was going to have to say to the Daily News, "Instead of my reporting back to you that the figures of HUEY LONG are incorrect, I am going to have to give you figures showing that he is not only telling the truth, but that the times in this country are a good deal worse than even he said they were", he wired to the paper and said: "Probably you do not want my figures, because they are going to be very startling"; and this paper says so. But, says this paper:

It was decided, after some deliberation, to publish them nevertheless. That decision was made on the ground that the ostrich act of sticking our heads in the sand, blinding ourselves to facts, will only do us harm in the long run. To suppress these facts might damper down some unrest for a while. But it is these facts which are causing the unrest.

And even then they are 18 years in finding it out. Eighteen years ago the Industrial Relations Committee reported to the Congress of the United States that it was the distribution of the wealth to such a large extent into the hands of the few that was causing the trouble in America.

The eventual kick-back would be much more serious if the facts continued to be kept under cover.

And they are ominous facts. It has happened time and again that when a nation's wealth has become concentrated in too few hands, and ways of redistributing part of it peaceably have not been worked out—

Get this, now, will you? Listen to me, you so-called "conservatives." Listen to me, you so-called "defenders of truth." Listen to me, you who have stood on this floor and said that your father was a Baptist minister. Since you want to be concerned with truth, perhaps the Baptist minister was not the only man who ought to have told the truth. The son of the Baptist minister might want to tell the truth sometimes himself. Who knows but that he would? Now, listen to me while I give you the figures:

And they are ominous facts. It has happened time and again that when a nation's wealth has become concentrated in too few hands, and ways of redistributing part of it peaceably have not been worked out, ways of redistributing it by violence have been adopted in time, as in France and Russia.

Says this biggest newspaper of the United States:

America has got to redistribute the wealth of this country into the hands of the people, one way or the other.

Says this newspaper:

If you do not redistribute the wealth that is in the hands of the few people, and put this money into the hands of people who need it, it will either be done by peaceable means or it will be done by bloodshed, as it was in France and Russia.

And this is the biggest newspaper owned by multimillionaire families in the United States of America.

And as long as mass purchasing power stays down and continues to shrink there will be overproduction of the bathtubs, cars, radios, etc., which we like to think are elements in the American standard of living.

Mr. President, I am not going to read more of these newspaper editorials and articles, but there are some several of them here. Here is one, for instance, published on the 8th day of April, which says:

Four percent own 87 percent of the United States, news survey shows.

I shall now go to something else. Somebody says that they are trying to defend the farm folks. I am not one who objects to farmers coming to Washington, D. C. I am only sorry that more of them could not come, and that so few of them have ever been here. It is a sad thing that, even with the few who did come here this time, according to my understanding, in the various communities the neighbors had to chip in so that they could pay the way of one man to Washington.

In a little community near where I live the farmers wanted one of their number to come. It cost $48.75 for a round-trip ticket, and the whole community chipped in two or three dollars apiece so that one farmer out of the whole community might come on this train here to Washington and see Congress and see the President of the United States.

Somebody says they brought 400 of them from Louisiana. According to a Washington newspaper, when President Roosevelt, on the White House lawn, was denouncing people who criticized his program, someone spoke up and mentioned my name. That might have been true, but out of the 400 farmers they brought from Louisiana I would not have any trouble getting my part of the votes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. To whom does the Senator refer when he says "out of the 400 farmers they brought from Louisiana"?

Mr. LONG. The railroad. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The visitors in the galleries must conform to the rules of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator mean to imply that the railroads should not have brought them?

Mr. LONG. No; not if they paid them.

Mr. ROBINSON. There was a plain implication—

Mr. LONG. There was not.

Mr. ROBINSON. In the Senator's statement that somebody had influenced them to come here.

Mr. LONG. No.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to say that, according to my information, these farmers came because they wanted the opportunity of presenting their views in the Capital concerning a subject matter of legislation that is of interest to the farmers of the country.

Mr. LONG. That is what I just said. The Senator did not hear me, or he would not have had to get up and take up my time. I did not even yield to him, but he got up and talked anyway.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well; if the Senator does not wish to yield, I will not interrupt him.

Mr. LONG. I do not object; but who has given anybody authority to get up and take charge?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. Yes; when I am asked to.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator a while ago violated the very rule to which he refers by speaking while not even rising.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Louisiana does that all the time, but he thinks he has a patent or monopoly on that process.

Mr. LONG. I am sorry the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Kentucky, after having heard a few things read to them, are getting their ire aroused.

Mr. BARKLEY. My ire is not aroused. I was never in better humor in my life.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I stated that a while ago I observed the Senator speaking out so that he could be heard all over the Senate without even rising, and I wondered if the same rule applied to him which he seeks to invoke toward others.

Mr. LONG. I do not think the Senator heard any such thing. If he did, I beg his pardon. I do not like to have anyone rise and just take charge of my speech. I always like to be asked.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I am glad to yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not think any Senator has made a speech on this floor in the last 30 days but that the Senator from Louisiana has literally butted into the speech.

Mr. LONG. If I have done so, I have asked the President to ask the Senator to yield. If the Senator will look up the RECORD he will see that in each instance I asked the President to ask the Senator to yield.

Now, let us get along. We have more business to talk about than this matter. I said I was only too sorry that more of these farmers could not come, and I said that all these farmers were not able to pay their own way, but that their communities wanted someone to come, down in my section of the country, and they chipped in—in lots of cases—two or three dollars apiece—so that someone of their neighbors might come here and present their views, and go back home and tell them what they found out.

I rather approved that. The only objection I have is that instead of only 400 farmers being able to come here from Louisiana, I wish they could have brought several thousand. But they were not able to come, or no doubt they would have come. I do not see any objection to it.

I was talking about the concentration of wealth. I come back to where I was before being interrupted. Farmers have come here on a farm program. They have been told, and I have been told, we have all been told, that there is need to decrease the amount of farm products in this country. The Senator from Michigan made a speech the other day, but did not entirely catch the point. He and the Senator from Tennessee did not see the proposition I was trying to get to their minds at all. Now, I want to tell both of those Senators, and all the Senators, what it was.

There is not any overproduction in the United States—I hope Senators will hear what I am saying—there is not any overproduction in the United States of cotton or of corn or of wheat. There is not any overproduction of rice or beans or cattle. There is an underproduction of those products.

However, the farmers of Louisiana, of Iowa, and of Texas, and all other States, are gradually being stamped out of existence, they are being fed by means of the dole, they are having to receive a subsidy called a process tax in order to live. They are being told to plow under their cotton, they are being told to kill their hogs, they are being told to shoot the cows, they are being told to pour the milk into the river. Why? Is it because there is an overproduction? No. It is because the people have not the money with which to buy the things they need and must consume if they are to live in a reasonable or respectable way. Farmers are not overproducing. Yet those poor farmers are being told that, "Next year you will not be able to get 11 or 12 cents for your cotton unless you decrease the amount of cotton you raise; you will not be able to sell your hogs unless you teach them to follow birth control; you will not be able to sell your cows unless you keep from raising many of them."

What is the condition? I will read it to the Senate. I have in my hand the Liberty Magazine. Members of the White House family are contributors to this magazine. The President's own daughter is one of the writers for this magazine. It is a magazine friendly to them. I will read to the Senate what it says:

The simplest way to come at them is to consult the table of per-capita food requirements of the American people under American standards of living as set forth in Circular 296, issued by the Department of Agriculture.

That circular is issued by the Government. Not only that, it is issued by the Department of Agriculture.

The Liberal Diet prescribed in that circular is based on food standards recommended by our most eminent authorities on nutrition.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. From what is the Senator reading? I know he is reading from a magazine, but what is the article and who wrote it?

Mr. LONG. It was written by Charles W. Burkett in Liberty Magazine of April 13, 1935.

Mr. BARKLEY. What is he discussing?

Mr. LONG. He is discussing the food supply of America. Now he is quoting a circular of the Agricultural Department, No. 296.

The Liberal Diet prescribed in that circular is based on food standards recommended by our most eminent authorities on nutrition. Such a diet would promote national health and well-being to the highest degree. At present we don't even come within sight of it.

Here is the Liberal Diet, showing the amounts and kinds of food which should be annually consumed per capita:

Remember this comes from the Department of Agriculture.

Food	Pounds
Flour and other cereals.....	100
Milk, fresh and evaporated.....	656
Irish and sweet potatoes.....	155
Dried beans, peas, and nuts.....	7
Tomatoes and citrus fruits.....	110
Leafy, green, and other vegetables.....	135
Dried fruits, raisins, prunes, etc.....	20
Other vegetables and fresh fruits.....	325
Butter.....	35
Other fats, bacon, and salt pork.....	17
Sugar, molasses, and other sweets.....	60
Lean meats, poultry, and fish.....	165
Eggs (360 individual) in pounds.....	34

That means less than one egg per day.

Total, annual poundage..... 1,819

One thousand eight hundred and nineteen pounds of food for every one person every year.

The right of every American citizen to such a diet as that should be undoubted. It is basic. And the only reason the American people have not demanded and bought from the farmers all the farmers could produce is simply that the prices have been too high relative to city incomes. * * *

The year 1929 was one of relatively large agricultural production.

I hope Senators get these figures. In 1929, the very year when we were supposed to have so much agricultural production, this very year when we had too much, and I thought we had too much at that time myself—

The year 1929 was one of relatively large agricultural production, or of "overproduction" according to the food destructionists. And yet a comparison of the 1929 production figures with those called for by the Liberal Diet makes it evident at a glance how far short we fell of our real necessities.

In other words if we take everything we raised in 1929 and compare that as against what the Department of Agriculture said we ought to have eaten we will find what?

Such a comparison reveals a production shortage—

That is in 1929, the year when we were supposed to produce so much that we never could consume it, and yet according to the table of the Department of Agriculture of 1929, if the people could have bought what they wanted to eat, how much overproduction would we have had? None! On the contrary:

Such a comparison reveals a production shortage in fruit of 39 percent; in vegetables, 10 percent; dried fruits, 69 percent.

Think of it, Senators. Let the Senator from Florida think of it; let the Senator from California think of it; let Senators who come from Mississippi and from the Rio Grande Valley of the State of Texas—Senators who saw their dried fruit products dumped into the Mississippi and into the Rio Grande and into the Gulf of Mexico and into the Pacific Ocean—let them think of that year 1929 when that was done, that there then was an actual food shortage of dried fruits of 69 percent. There was only 31 percent of the Nation's requirement of dried fruits produced that year. There was a shortage of 69 percent of dried fruits, according to the United States table of standards, and yet nonetheless, a large part of that 31 percent of dried fruits produced was not sold on the market.

Milk. How much overproduction in milk? Why, there was a shortage of milk, according to what the people ought to have had. It says in this article:

Milk, exclusive of that used for butter, 33 percent.

There was too little of milk; not too much!

Butter. Was it overproduced? Why, it went to waste. The farmers held up one another's wagons to keep them from bringing it into town, because they were flooding the market, but milk was underproduced, and butter was underproduced 51 percent. And then sugar products were underproduced 30 percent. Beef, pork, mutton, poultry, and fish, 9 percent underproduced; and eggs 27 percent underproduced.

It got down to the point where you could not give eggs away. You could not sell them, you could not give them away; you could not sell milk, butter, rice, potatoes; you could not give cotton away. Notwithstanding that fact, according to the United States Government, there was a shortage in production of every one of those things.

What did Roosevelt say? He said there is no overproduction. He said we have got to give a purchasing power to the masses. Then is when Franklin Delano Roosevelt announced that he was in favor of the share-our-wealth platform. Then is when he got up in the Chicago convention, when a man was supposed to be a man, and stood on his hind legs and said that "the crying need of the country is for more and equitable opportunity to share in the distribution of wealth", and our report says "applause and cheers" when he made that statement on the floor of the convention.

What did we do through the leadership of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], to whose speech I am now replying, and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], to whom I am still replying? What did we do? Did we come into the United States Senate and provide that we would give the people more money so they could buy the things which the United States Government said they had to have in order to live? Did we come here and provide that they could buy more and provide that instead of the farmer continuing underproduction he might produce what was expected to be consumed by the people?

No. We did not. I say "we" did not. I have to include myself in it, though I tried to do the contrary. We did not provide to "share the wealth." We did not provide to produce up to what standard statistics said the human family had to have to live on. On the contrary, what did we do? We allowed the rich to become richer and the poor to become poorer, according to this big newspaper which was going to disprove the statements I made, but which it admits now to be true. We allowed the rich to become richer and the poor to become poorer. We gave the masses less with which to buy.

What was the remedy finally followed? The remedy was that since the people could not buy we had to burn up what we could not sell, and plow under what nobody would have any money to buy. We adopted that expedient, and that has been all we have ever done.

Why, Gentlemen of the Senate, someone has said I am at war with the President. With which President am I at war? Am I at war with the President who took the nomination of the Democratic convention in Chicago in 1932? No. That man is my brother. Is he demised? Has there been a funeral and another one born since then? Whether he has gone through the stages necessary to come into new life, physically or spiritually speaking, is not the question. I mean as a matter of political advocacy, as a matter of political thought, is that man to whom we gave the nomination and who uttered those words at the Chicago convention in 1932 still alive? If he is alive, he is a boon companion of mine because I am standing where he stood in 1932. Yea, more, I am standing where I stood before he took that stand.

And now, when we have gotten into the calamitous condition where we are legislating in the Congress of the United States to keep from producing because the people cannot buy, when we have turned the horse around the other way and said to the people, "We are not able to give you the purchasing power and therefore we have to reduce the producing power", we have done what? We have opened up the country to the stagnation and calamities with which we were threatened when man was first placed on earth. We have brought on the dust storm. Yea, we brought on the dust storm. We brought on the shortages. We brought on the poverty. We aggravated the misery. We promoted the rich to become richer and the poor to become poorer, and today what is before the American Congress?

We have reduced the purchasing power of the masses in the last 3 years, and the figures here show it. We have 22,000,000 on the relief dole and 10,000,000 to 15,000,000 more people trying to get on it. The United States Relief Department says that $8 is enough for one family to eat on, and, therefore, with that starvation diet we have prescribed under the dole they have forgotten the diet the health authorities of the Department of Agriculture, in 1929, and up to now, said was necessary for the human family, and have decided to reduce the people to where it is a bread-line proposition of getting a cup of soup for supper and some little hand-out for breakfast in the morning.

I come back now to my friends from Arkansas and Kentucky. I come back to this radio address.

Mr. President, there is more joy in Heaven over one lost soul that is saved than over a thousand that are already saved.

Mr. BARKLEY rose.

Mr. LONG. Just a moment!

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. In a moment!

Mr. BARKLEY. I want to express the belief that when the Senator finally is saved there will be such great rejoicing that it will create more than a dust storm in those regions. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. I am talking about political salvation.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not so much interested in that as I am in the Senator's soul.

Mr. LONG. I fear I should admit there will be a dust storm when the announcement is made in heaven that I have been saved, and I would like the Senator's help. The Senator from Kentucky reminds me of old Deacon Jones. When Deacon Jones got sick the people were prevented from talking over the telephone by their putting up a blackboard for announcements about his condition:

One o'clock: Deacon Jones very sick.

Two o'clock: Deacon Jones grows worse.

Three o'clock: Deacon Jones gone to heaven.

Four o'clock came around and some fellow went there and put up the following announcement:

Four o'clock: Great excitement in heaven. Deacon Jones has not yet arrived.

[Laughter.]

There may be that much excitement in my case. I am afraid there will be that much excitement up there, too, if the Senator from Kentucky is allowed to enter the pearly gates. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator might bear in mind the prayer delivered at the revival services in which the man prayed fervently that Deacon Jones might be sent to hell. When the services were over he was asked why he offered such a prayer. He said:

Well, Deacon Jones had broken up the Methodist Church, he had broken up the Baptist Church, he had broken up the Campbellite Church, he had broken up the Presbyterian Church, he had broken up everything he had ever got into, and I am just in hopes that if the Lord sends him to hell he might break that up, too.

[Laughter.]

That might be the situation in which the Senator from Louisiana would find himself if he ever got there.

Mr. LONG. I appreciate that joke. [Laughter.] The trouble is it takes my kind to bring the Senator from Kentucky into the majority. If it had not been for a few of my kind he would still be sitting on the mourners' bench. [Laughter.] We might have broken up the country when we did it, too. [Laughter.]

There is more joy in heaven for one soul that is saved than for a thousand that are already saved. If I could convince the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Arkansas of the error of their understanding, if I could convince them that 2 and 2 make 4, if I could convince them that an elephant cannot be put through a keyhole, if I could convince them that water will not run up hill, if I could convince them of these simple axiomatic rules of mathematics, I would have more joy in my heart than I have had in the advocacy of these principles for years.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The trouble is that the Senator is trying to teach us that 2 and 2 do not make 4, that an elephant can go through the eye of a needle, and that water can run up hill; and I cannot be convinced of that.

Mr. LONG. That just shows how blind the Senator from Kentucky is.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I may be blind, but I can see the Senator from Louisiana, and see through him.

Mr. LONG. Here are these multimillionaire families that found out the truth, and they admitted the truth; but with all that the Senator from Kentucky cannot see it. He is like the rich man who allowed Lazarus to stay outside the gate, with the dogs licking his sores, begging for the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table. When Lazarus had died and the rich man had died, and the rich man looked afar off and saw Abraham with Lazarus in his bosom, the rich man cried and said, "Father Abraham, send Lazarus that he may pour water and cool my tongue!" Abraham said, "It cannot be done." The rich man said, "Then send Lazarus back to earth that he may tell my four brothers there of the torments with which I am afflicted, that they may avoid this place." Abraham said, "There is not a bit of use. They have Moses and the prophets back there, and if they will not believe Moses and the prophets they will not believe one who has risen from the dead and has come back to earth."

The Senator from Kentucky stands here today, with far less food than is needed in some instances being produced in the United States—a three-fourths food shortage in dried fruit, a 39-percent shortage in butter, a 40-percent shortage in eggs—and with all the shortages in dried fruits and these other things, the Senator from Kentucky has his eyes blinded. "None so blind as those having eyes that see not; none so deaf as those having ears that hear not." He is so blind that he has it in his head that when you have too little food, and still the people cannot buy it, the only remedy is to go and burn up some more of the food that you have.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President—

Mr. LONG. Just one word. It makes me think of a man who seized the 140-acre farm of a man for a debt he owed to the store. The old man went off, and a few years later he came back, and meanwhile the other man has discovered oil on the land. The old man went in and said, "Mr. So-and-so, you seized that 140 acres of land for a $100 debt, and you have got $1,000,000 of oil off it. Don't you think you ought to help me out and give me a little something?" The man said, "Why, certainly my friend. I think I owe you something." He called his clerk and he said, "Come here, Jim. Go back of that counter and get this man a bottle of Sloan's liniment. He may have the rheumatism for all I know." [Laughter.]

The great trouble with the Senator from Kentucky and those like him is that they imagine they are liberal to the American people, who are entitled to live in decency and respectability, and they think they have done those people a great favor when they hand them a little six- or eight-dollar dole by which they can live and barely exist in poverty and in misery; and still the Senator from Kentucky thinks he has brought blessings to his soul, and glorified the administration in Washington, and placed a crown of glory on the head of the chieftain, as long as he doles out a little money to allow a man to live on earth in misery, and below the line of any such thing as a respectable standard of poverty.

You can convince some people but you cannot convince the casehardened politician. When they get those ideas in their minds they will not see the facts. They cannot be made to see them. The President saw them. He said he saw them. But has he forgotten? We thought the Federal Trade Commission saw them. The Industrial Relations Commission saw them. The multimillionaires say they saw them. What do they say? I am reading from the biggest newspaper in the United States, owned by multimillionaire families. What does it say? It says this:

It has happened time and again that when a nation's wealth has become concentrated in too few hands, and ways of redistributing part of it peaceably have not been worked out, ways of redistributing it by violence have been adopted in time—as in France and in Russia.

And this paper says that the wealth is concentrated in the hands of the few far more than I said it was, and that something has to be done about it.

Congress is going to adjourn, they say. I guess it will. It would have been better if it never had met. Congress is going to adjourn with nothing whatever done to increase the purchasing power of the masses. The only reform that is urged is to destroy a little more cotton, and a little more pork, and a little more sugar, and a little more molasses, and teach the hens not to lay eggs, and give lessons of birth-control to the swine and to the cattle, so that they will not raise too much of those products to flood the market for a public that has not the money with which to buy.

I was hoping that would convince these Senators so that now I could talk to them about the proposed legislation. If they will read what I have said, they will be convinced.

Perhaps these Senators think that what I have said is just a mistake. I should be glad if they would read what James Madison said. You have all heard of James Madison writing most of the Constitution of the United States.

Do you know what he said, Mr. President? He said, along about the time when the Constitution was being written, before it was written or shortly after it was written, according to an excerpt which I clipped out of a New York newspaper a few days ago, that the time would come when the wealth of America would get into the hands of the few, and that the only way in which the Constitution could exist and the Republic could exist would be for the American people to be farsighted and broad-minded enough to know that they had to redistribute the wealth into the hands of the masses, in order that the people could live in something like a decent, respectable status. That is what he said. He said that if they did not do it, the country would never survive. That was said not only by him, but by others. Daniel Webster, who was a great follower of James Madison, came along, and when he delivered his famous speech at Plymouth he made exactly the same statement.

Senators talk about the faith of the founders. I was amazed to read the remarks by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], about the faith of the founders of this country. The Senator from Arkansas failed to remember something he read long ago. Who were the founders of this country?

Does the Senator refer to the Pilgrims who landed at Plymouth in the year 1620? If he does, he has only to turn back and look to the law under which the Pilgrims settled this country.

In the year 1620, on July 1, when the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth, they displayed a compact that was to be the law of the country under which they were to live. It had been signed by every man on board the Mayflower, and article five of that compact of the Pilgrims provided that at the end of every seventh year they would wipe out every debt and redistribute the property equally among all the people who lived in this country at that time.

My friend, the Senator from Massachusetts, may never have read that, but that is how they settled the State from which he comes. When those people landed at Plymouth in the year 1620 their plan was not the conservative rule I am undertaking to bring about; it was the rule prescribed in the Bible absolutely, that at the end of every seventh year they should remit debts. They went the Bible one better, and provided that at the end of every seventh year they would redistribute all the property into the hands of all the people.

Why did they enter into any such compact? Because they knew they had to fight the Indians. They knew they had to develop the country. They knew they had to establish a new frontier every year, and they knew that the only way by which they would ever succeed was through the understanding of one for the other, and that each and every one of them would travel along under a plan of mutual assistance.

When the forefathers came to write the Constitution of the United States, and even before that time, when they came to write the Declaration of Independence, in July 1776, the one thing about which they were careful above all things was to write in there words and symbols which meant that the wealth of this country should always be kept reasonably distributed in the hands of the people.

I shall not read all that Madison said; I shall not read what Ralph Waldo Emerson said; I shall not read what that famous son of New Hampshire, and who adopted Massachusetts as his State, said; but I have all those various and sundry declarations here, and if anyone wishes to see them, I shall be pleased to give him whatever information along that line he may request.

I now come to the year 1935. I am sorry the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Kentucky have left the Chamber.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am still here. The Senator is blinder than I am. I am sitting here close enough to him to touch him, and he says I have gone. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. That is correct; the Senator is absolutely correct. These associations are catching, they are contagious. Being around the Senator from Kentucky tends to blindness even with me. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thought the Senator was impervious to any influence I might exercise over him.

Mr. LONG. Oh, no. I listened to the Senator once, and I have been sorry ever since. I let the Senator from New York and the Senator from Kentucky advise me one night, when I did not know whether to vote for a bill or against it. I was against half of it and for half of it, and the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from New York suggested that I had better vote for it, and I did so, and the Senator from Missouri has been jumping on me about it ever since.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator from Louisiana had been guilty of voting blindly on only one occasion, we might forgive him, but he has been following that practice ever since.

Mr. LONG. Let us hope it has never been that bad.

Mr. President, the Senators from Arkansas and Kentucky want me to tell them how I would draw the legislation. I do not have to have a pencil and a piece of paper. I have drawn it up many times, and I will give it to them without a pencil and paper. These remarks will be down in writing, and they can be read tomorrow by whoever wishes to read them. I could dictate them without having to change a word if I had plenty of time just to stand here and outline it to the reporter. I will not take the time necessary to do that, but will state what the plan is.

First, I would guarantee that there would be no such thing in the United States as a man possessing more than somewhere around 100 to 200 times the average family wealth. What would that mean in the United States today? It would mean that there would be nobody in the United States who could own more than between a million and a half and three million dollars as a fortune. I might get it down a little below that.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In the resolution which the Senator offered on January 4, 1934, he provided that each person might own $50,000,000.

Mr. LONG. As a limit.

Mr. BARKLEY. As a limit; yes.

Mr. LONG. And in the one before that, a hundred million.

Mr. BARKLEY. So the Senator is now getting down to about five or six million, as he stated in the last speech he made.

Mr. LONG. No.

Mr. BARKLEY. In the speech the Senator made in Des Moines a few days ago, he said he would let each man own as much as five or six million.

Mr. LONG. Somewhere around that.

Mr. BARKLEY. Prior to that he had said three or four million.

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, there is not much difference between three or four and five or six million.

Mr. LONG. And before that, $50,000,000; and before that, $100,000,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. So the Senator is gradually coming down—

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Until he may after a while get to a point where there would be a division of wealth which might be regarded as a sharing of the wealth.

Mr. LONG. I will answer the Senator.

Mr. BARKLEY. Inasmuch as in 1929 there were only 1,700 people who owned as much as $4,000,000 worth of property, and the aggregate wealth was only $20,000,000,000, and inasmuch as in 1932 there were only 800 who owned more than $4,000,000, and the aggregate wealth was about fifty billion, how does the Senator figure that any such division as could be regarded as a sharing of the wealth program which would only divide or share the wealth of some 800 or at most 1,700 people with one hundred and twenty-five or one hundred and thirty million, would be such a sharing of wealth as would produce the results to which he refers?

Mr. LONG. First, the figures of the Senator from Kentucky are not at all correct, not half correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. What is the Senator's authority for that?

Mr. LONG. The figures of the United States Census as to the United States wealth and income; the figures of the United States Federal Trade Commission—

Mr. BARKLEY. The figures I have quoted are taken from the official reports of the United States—

Mr. LONG. What reports?

Mr. BARKLEY. As accurately as they can be obtained through the Treasury Department.

Mr. LONG. Oh, my! They must be some Mellon figures.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is the nearest to an accurate census of property in the United States, the census for taxing purposes.

Mr. LONG. No, Mr. President; the United States wealth is in the shape I have previously indicated, as the figures have been examined by the New York Daily News here with a corps of experts. They found my figures to be very conservative; they say it is more concentrated than I figured. They reviewed the tables I gave beginning in 1916, going as far as 1930, and there is no question about it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LONG. No; just let me answer the last question. I want to get through with the last question. The Senator asked me three questions.

No. 1. More than 59 percent of the wealth of this country is in the hands of 1 percent of the people, and according to the News' survey on a readjustment, 63 percent of the wealth is owned by one-half percent of the people at this date. That is the report based on their survey.

No. 2. The Senator's question was as to why I started in limiting fortunes at $100,000,000, then $50,000,000, then $10,000,000, then $5,000,000, then $3,000,000. I undertook to get any kind of a limit before the Senate. I tried to drive through the policy that there had to be some kind of a limit on fortunes of some kind or other set up as a policy of the Congress of the United States. I was trying to get a principle vindicated, so I mentioned $100,000,000, then $50,000,000, until I drove it into the minds and into the consciences of a number of people of the United States that there had to be some kind of a limitation of fortunes. Then when people noticed it, I came down to an amount and to a set plan, which I am now setting out. I never have been able to pass any kind of such law establishing any limit as yet. I will, though, if any country is left here.

I am stating how the legislation would be drawn, since the Senator from Kentucky wants to know. Now I have to start all over again. I ask the Senator to let me complete just this statement, and then I will yield for questions.

Section 1: No person shall own or possess wealth or property in the United States of America beyond an amount in excess of 200 times the average family fortune.

This means that we would limit fortunes tomorrow to somewhere around $3,000,000.

Section 2: There shall be guaranteed a homestead to every family in the United States of America.

This is nothing new.

The goods and properties hereinafter enumerated are not to be alienated without the consent of a court, and then only for the purpose of reinvestment in another homestead, under authority of law, which said homestead itself shall not be worth less than one-third the wealth of the average family in the United States of America.

That is just as simple as falling off a log. It fixes a limit. It is nothing new. Louisiana has such a law, as have Texas and Florida. The homestead cannot be seized for debt, and in Louisiana it cannot be seized for taxes to some extent. That is nothing new.

No one should have a homestead worth less than one-third the average family fortune. How much would that have been, according to the United States estimates, in the prosperous days, and if my plan were adopted you would not find a record of a time in the past when our people were as prosperous as they would then be.

There was national wealth amounting to around $421,000,000,000 at one time, according to the estimates. Take that $421,000,000,000 and divide it into 24,000,000 families in the United States, and you have an average wealth of $17,000 to the family.

Guarantee to every family a homestead of one-third that amount, somewhere between five and six thousand dollars, and that will mean that every family of an average of four and a half to five people, according to the figures—the number varies depending on whether times are good or bad—would have a shelter under which to live, and would have those things necessary to enable them to live in respectable comfort and happiness. They would be able to have a home in which to live, land to till if they were farmers, and the furniture and the accoutrements of a house up to the value of $5,000, free of debt, and there would be no trouble about it. Each family might have some kind of automobile and radio. All free of debt.

No. 3. Listen to this. It will make the Senator from Kentucky shudder to hear how simple it is.

The income of every family of America shall not be less than from one-third to one-half the average family income of the particular year. The income of no one person shall be more than 100 times the income of the average family for that year.

What does that mean? Now I have to refer to some books, so that the Senator from Kentucky will know I am telling him the truth. Here is one of the books. A while back, when this "share our wealth" movement got so strong in the United States that societies were being formed everywhere, the departments of this Government thought they would have to do something to show how ridiculous the whole scheme of things was.

So they got some experts, and they put them in the Interior Department, I am told, to gather up the statistics to show that there could not be enough earned in this country to do such a thing as I was advocating. So, I am told, they called in a number of men and they went to work to get up the figures, and they got up the figures and laid them on the desks of the chieftains, figures which the chieftains expected to use to show that there could not be such incomes to distribute so as to make every family in America affluent and independent. But what happened? When the investigators got ready to lay these charts on the doorsteps of those men who were going to use this information in order to send it to the college professors and the school teachers so that their learning might be diffused down to the lowest strata, and their scholars would learn from their lips and from their pens that what I was advocating and what others like me were advocating was ridiculous and absurd—when they laid their data down the result was that everyone of those who had done that work was fired. When the data was laid down, those who received it did not do what the Daily News did, which, when it found the true facts, did not hesitate to publish them. The newspapers said, "We are surprised", but nevertheless it published the facts. Not so with the Government.

Here are the facts. They fired every "dad-gummed" one of the investigators. However, those investigators took the data out with them. This is the information given to me. What I have stated may not be correct. It is the information, however, given to me by some of these gentlemen. I understood the document was coming out in a few days. Lo and behold, the next thing I heard about this document which was going to come out and the figures which were going to confound the figures I was giving was one day when I was called out into the reception room, and a young man said, "Senator Long, I wish to give you a book", and he gave me this book on which was inscribed:

To Senator Long, with my heartiest compliments. Samuel Willig, 1907 North American Building, Philadelphia, Pa.

Another gentleman, not so closely connected with the matters I have just mentioned, came to me a few days later and handed me another book, an entirely private publication.

However, here is the book which this young man handed me in the reception room. It is "The Chart of Plenty." It is published by Harold Loeb and Associates. In it he gives a chart and every datum that could possibly be required, and shows that without the least trouble at all there can be at least an average family income of around $5,000 a year in America if wealth and income are reasonably distributed, so that people can purchase, and mechanical appliances can be used, rather than prohibited because of a lack of distribution of income and capital.

Therefore if it can be guaranteed that a family will never be below the poverty line of somewhere around $2,000 in annual income, it would still leave somewhere around one-half of the income of the head of such a family, if not more—perhaps two-thirds of it—to be used and to be garnered by the man with better intellect and by the financial masters who weave not, but who nevertheless are arrayed in such manner that not even Solomon in all his glory appears as one of them.

How would this be done? What will we do with the hours of labor?

Mr. President, I am an advocate of short working hours, and the short working week, and the short working year, but I am not so sure that we would reduce the hours of labor nearly so much as I originally advocated, because the day we begin to diffuse these products to be consumed among the people we have a great amount of work to do. Why? Because, according to this book entitled "The Chart of Plenty", the colleges of the United States would have to be five times their present size. Imagine such a thing! According to this book, the day that plan would be put into effect, or some plan which would guarantee the diffusion of the wealth of this country, the colleges of the United States would have to be five times their present size.

According to these statistics, we would have every reason in the world to expand. We would have a flood-control program. We would not be fighting the flood waters in Louisiana and Missouri and Mississippi and Arkansas and Tennessee. We would have a quarrel in this country over where we would get water enough to supply the various needs. We would have, in effect, that plan which has been worked out by the United States Army, to the point where there would never be a dust storm, to the point where there would never be a desert, to where there would never be any flood, or any season of the year when there was not water enough for year-around navigation. There would not be any drought then. That is the condition we would have. We would have a country here where mankind could enjoy these things rather than to be penalized without them.

How are we going to get this money? That is very simple. It is very simple how we are going to get the money. The Lord tells us how to get it. The Lord says how—and He was pretty smart. The great trouble is most of our Senators and Representatives refuse to abide by the laws which are propounded in the Scriptures. Those laws are not dead. I desire to tell the Members of the Senate that, in my opinion—and I am like Daniel Webster was about that—the same law which allows the sun to rise in the morning, which allows the moon to shine at night, the same law which allows the earth to turn around on its axis, the same law which allows the stars to shine, is the divine law of our Creator, the same divine Creator who said that wealth had to be redistributed every 49 years, and who said that debts had to be remitted every 7 years.

I say, Mr. President, that the law is just as compulsory to a nation and a people, a law which says that we have to remit debts every 7 years and says we have to redistribute wealth—that law is just as compulsory as the law which allows the stars to shine and allows the sun to rise. The Creator is as much the controller of one natural law as He is the controller of another natural law, and the only way you can keep the people of any country from becoming cannibals is to see that what is on earth for mankind is consumed and shared by mankind, and so long as we allow one man to have 10,000—yea, 100,000 times more than the average man has, so long as we allow 600 families in the United States of America to have three or four times as much as 123,000,000 people have, just so certain are we to send the people to the damnation bowwows of eternity as we are, Mr. President, doing this very day, because we undertake to contravene the laws of God.

Mr. President, how are we going to get this money? We are going to take into the ownership of the United States of America every dollar, every bit of property that anybody owns above a few million dollars, and we are going to distribute that property, either by selling it and distributing it or otherwise, to those who have less than a homestead, of around $5,000. That is how we are going to get it.

It is said that cannot be done. It has been done. The Bible says it has been done. The Bible says it can be done. The Bible says that every man will rest under his own vine and under his own tree, and that they who have houses, goods, and things of which they have no need, will bring them in to those who rule, and those who rule will distribute them out to those who have need of them. That is what is said in the Bible. You do not have to go very far to find out how it is all going to be done, or how it must be done.

Now, Mr. President, I have no objection to the Senate recessing.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I do not know of anything which the Senate would rather do at this moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield the floor?

Mr. LONG. Yes, Mr. President.

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, yesterday or the day before, when I was discussing the bill then pending to amend certain sections of the T. V. A. Act, I intended to ask unanimous consent to include as a part of my remarks a report made by a member of the Board on the general subject of the T. V. A. electrical program. I forgot it and did not make the request. I now ask unanimous consent that the report may be printed in the RECORD at the close of the few remarks which I am about to make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to invite the attention of Senators very briefly to what the report is and to comment on one or two statements in it. It is a general and brief history of what is being attempted to be done and what is being done by the T. V. A. It gives some statistics, which are very illuminating, as to the cost of the production of electricity, its generation, transmission, and distribution. It calls attention to the work of the T. V. A. in generating electricity and transmitting it, and then to the fact that after it is transmitted and sold to the municipalities it becomes the duty of the municipality to do the distributing.

The report shows there is not much difference in the cost of generation and transmission of electricity, but the great difference in cost comes in its distribution to the consumer. The report refers to what has taken place in a few of the towns which are purchasing electricity from the T. V. A., and disposes of many objections which are so often made—for instance, with reference to taxes and other similar objections which are made.

The report refers, as an illustration, to what is being done in the town of Tupelo, Miss., and other towns in which the electricity generated at Wilson Dam and controlled by the T. V. A. is being sold. The average price of electricity to the consumers in the homes is 2.2 cents per kilowatt-hour, which is less than half the general average paid by consumers over the entire United States for electricity. The schedule, which they provide must be put into effect before they will sell electricity to a municipality, commences with a top rate of 3 cents per kilowatt-hour, and the rate is reduced so that the average, during the time they have been furnishing electricity, is 2.2 cents per kilowatt-hour.

By a table attached to the report is shown what has been taken into consideration. For instance, taking Tupelo as an example, at the end of the first year of operation this city had met all charges, including a large tax payment, and still was able to show a profit of $24,875.

I notice in the table attached to the statement, from the financial activities that have occurred during that time, that taxes are paid. The municipality is required to pay, in lieu of taxes, an amount sufficient to equal the taxes if the property used in the distribution of electricity were privately owned. The taxes in that town, for the year in which this report was made, were $6,657.32. Depreciation of $5,227.31 was charged. They are also required to pay to the city—something that has never been done by any private company—interest on the amount of property used in the business owned by the city. The operation of the plant must pay interest to the city based on the ownership of the property. The interest amounted to $2,580.56. The return on the investment of the city was $4,570.54. After all these things were done, after all these payments were made, the city still had a net income above all expenses of $24,874.84.

EXHIBIT A

A STATEMENT OF FACTS CONCERNING THE T. V. A. ELECTRICITY PROGRAM

The Tennessee Valley Authority announced the wholesale and retail rates at which it would dispose of surplus power from Wilson Dam in September 1933. These rates were set up on the principle that consumers of electricity must pay all the costs of furnishing that electricity without any contribution from taxpayers. It is these rates which have been described as a yardstick with which to measure and compare the rates charged by private utilities.

THE COST OF GENERATING ELECTRICITY IS SMALL

The cost of furnishing electricity to citizens may be divided, for the purpose of such comparisons, into two parts, namely, (1) the cost of generating and transmitting the power to the city gate, (2) the cost of distributing the electricity within the city to the consumer. With the first item of cost there appear to be only small differences between the rates charged by private utilities and by the T. V. A.

The Mississippi Power Co. has contracted to furnish the municipal plant at West Point, Miss., wholesale power at a flat rate of 7 mills per kilowatt-hour.

The Alabama Power Co. sells power at wholesale to Birmingham Electric Co. at the city gate for as low as 5.8 mills per kilowatt-hour.

T. V. A. rates for similar service average approximately 6 mills per kilowatt-hour.

THE LEGITIMATE COST OF ELECTRICITY IN THE HOME

From this it would appear that the differences in cost of generation and transmission of electricity is not very great, even with the further reduction in generating costs which T. V. A. will be able to make when an integrated development of the river has been accomplished. But this portion of the yardstick is only a small fraction of the cost of electricity to citizens. The average rate paid by residential consumers in the United States is 5.2 cents per kilowatt-hour. On the basis of delivering power at a city's gate at 6 mills per kilowatt-hour, and distributing it to the consumer at an average of 5.2 cents per kilowatt-hour, it is evident that the cost of generation and transmission of electricity by private utilities accounts for less than one-eighth of the cost to the consumer. More than seven-eighths of the yardstick involves the distribution of the power from the city's gates to the residential consumer. The cost of the generation and transmission of electricity is by far the smallest factor of cost—the yardstick has its chief importance in disclosing the legitimate cost of bringing the electricity from the city gate into the consumer's home. And here the figures are startling.

T. V. A. CITIES SERVE CONSUMERS AT ONE-HALF—MAKE LARGE PROFITS

Residential consumers being served by municipalities distributing T. V. A. electricity pay an average of approximately 2.2 cents a kilowatt-hour—less than one-half the national average charged by private utilities. How have these municipalities fared in buying T. V. A. power at about 6 mills and reselling it at yardstick rates which reduce the cost of electricity to their citizens from 40 to 60 percent? They have been able to meet all the costs of operation, taxes, amortization, depreciation, interest on investment, in fact every legitimate charge faced by a private utility and still return from 20 to 25 percent of all gross revenue to surplus. This has been true of all municipalities distributing T. V. A. power. As an example, we may take Tupelo, Miss. At the end of the first year of operation this city had met all charges including a large tax payment and still was able to show a profit of $24,875, or almost 20 percent net profit on the investment in property and plant. In Alcorn County, Miss., including the city of Corinth, where T. V. A. power is retailed by a nonprofit country-wide co-operative association, a surplus, after all charges, is accumulating at a rate that will permit this association to retire the entire cost of its original distributing facilities within a period of less than 4 years.

NO "WATER" IN VALUATION OF T. V. A. PLANTS

Municipalities and associations distributing T. V. A. power must agree by contract to set aside, among other items, a sum to cover local, State, and county taxes; and carry their plants on their books at actual values. The significance of this latter provision in the yardstick becomes apparent when it is recalled the Federal Trade Commission reported to the United States Senate on February 5, 1935, that as a result of its 6-year investigation in the public-utilities field it had found write-ups amounting to $1,400,000,000 in top holding, subholding, and operating companies.

So, by comparison with wholesale rates of private utilities it appears that the T. V. A. wholesale rate is not too low, and by actual experience in cities reselling this power at T. V. A. retail rates the yardstick is found to be a full 36 inches in length.

In the face of these results special interests which seek to thwart T. V. A.'s program and prevent the American public from learning the true cost of furnishing electric service have sought to becloud the issue with arguments concerning the generation of power at Wilson Dam. The cost of generating electricity, as is well known, accounts for a very small fraction of the total price charged residential consumers. The allegation is made that private utilities could sell electricity to consumers as cheaply, if not cheaper, than T. V. A. if they were granted the same "subsidies" and "privileges" that T. V. A. enjoys. Let us examine some of these charges.

THE ACTUAL VALUE OF WILSON DAM

Spokesmen for utility interests have said that the cost of Wilson Dam (T. V. A.'s present source of electricity) was $60,000,000 and that T. V. A. has written this down to $19,000,000.

Wilson Dam at Muscle Shoals was begun during the World War as a war measure. Twelve separate appropriations were made before the work was finished, which was not until 1925. Several major interruptions of construction with attendant disbanding of personnel occurred. Engineers have estimated that at least $10,000,000 could have been saved had the construction been carried out as a single operation.

The historical cost of Wilson Dam is a little under $47,000,000, not $60,000,000. Eliminating the waste which occurred in construction, and allowing a fair amount for depreciation since date of completion, the present worth of the dam is $33,000,000.

To apportion the value of Wilson Dam among navigation, national defense, and power, the Authority first set aside those parts of the structure which are of exclusive use to one or another purpose: The locks to navigation, the power house to power, certain buildings and roads (not otherwise useful) to national defense. The remainder (chiefly the long spillway section in the middle) was divided between navigation and power.

The result was to allocate approximately $10,000,000 to navigation, $22,000,000 to power, and $1,500,000 to national defense. These figures are tentative, as the study of costs ordered by Congress is not yet completed. All private bids for the plant have been far below this valuation.

Allocation of cost of dams on the Tennessee River to navigation, flood control, national defense, and power provided for by law is not an advantage claimed by T. V. A., but is a definite national policy which has been made available to private utilities. The Congress in 1930, under a previous administration, authorized that $75,000,000, estimated as the cost of low dams for providing a 9-foot navigation channel on the Tennessee River to Knoxville, should be contributed to States, municipalities, or private corporations if they constructed high dams (such as the T. V. A. is doing). In another river and harbor act of Congress a very large contribution—some $12,000,000 of Government funds—was provided to be paid to a private utility planning a high dam at Aurora Landing on the Tennessee River. This was a national appropriation to a private agency made because the power dam it proposed to construct would aid navigation to the extent of this sum.

The simple fact, then, is that, as required by law, the Tennessee Valley Authority has placed the value of Wilson Dam for power purposes at its actual "present value."

T. V. A. SETS ASIDE FUNDS COVERING TAXES

The T. V. A. Act requires that 5 percent of gross sales of power be paid to the State where T. V. A. power is generated as compensation for loss of tax revenue. This figure was set up by Congress, subject to change should it prove in practice either too high or too low.

To keep the yardstick absolutely fair, however, the T. V. A. sets aside an additional 7½ percent of its gross revenue, making a total of 12½ percent for the generation and transmission of power in lieu of taxes. For utility operations in the United States as a whole the taxes amounted to 12.7 percent of gross revenue in 1933, when the T. V. A. rates were established. The taxes paid by the four utilities operating in the Tennessee Valley region averaged 11.8 percent of gross revenue at that time.

This 12.5 percent which T. V. A. carries is on generation and transmission. The taxes on properties used for distribution of T. V. A. power are borne, as stated previously, by municipal distribution systems.

T. V. A. figures its tax equivalent upon the basis of percent of gross revenue in order to establish comparison with the various tax systems in use throughout the country. No matter whether taxes are levied against income, property valuation, or volume of business, they can all be reduced to the common denominator of a percentage of gross revenue. The percentage of income T. V. A. set up as an equivalent of taxes paid conformed to the national average for utilities when the rates were fixed and was higher than the average at that time of the four companies operating in the T. V. A. region.

T. V. A. INTEREST RATES IN LINE WITH THOSE OF PRIVATE UTILITIES

In computing electric rates, T. V. A. figured an interest rate of 3½ percent on its investment. This is higher than the actual cost of money to the Government, including fiscal expense of the Treasury, and it is not out of line with the rates at which some private utilities are now carrying out refunding operations. Whatever slight advantage accrues to T. V. A. on interest rates is more than offset by the costs of services of a public character which T. V. A. is glad to assume and which are not assumed by private corporations.

Among these may be considered wage rates for both skilled and unskilled labor. These average from 50 to 75 percent higher than those paid by public utilities on similar construction in this area. Likewise, in areas where T. V. A. has purchased electric systems from private utilities the employees were found to be receiving wages from 10 to 30 percent below those which T. V. A. pays for similar work.

Some of the other advantages ascribed to T. V. A. by special interests are pure fiction. The T. V. A. does not use its franking privilege in sending out electricity bills; T. V. A. does not purchase materials unless the seller agrees to comply with the N. R. A. code; it pays all other governmental departments for services rendered and foots the bill of defending litigation brought by public utilities and others, which has held up the sale of surplus power from Wilson Dam and delayed the time when T. V. A. can begin paying back to the Government the costs of Wilson Dam and thus salvage a wartime investment.

ONE ADVANTAGE SAVES A DIME IN A LIFETIME

Seeking to obscure the real issues, special interests have made much ado over the fact that the Tennessee Valley Authority receives a reduction in freight rates on some of its hauling. Land-grant railroads in consideration of the land originally given them grant a 33⅓-percent reduction on all Government hauling. The T. V. A. receives this reduction on that part of the equipment and materials used in dam construction which travels over land-grant railroads.

Of the total cost of a dam, however, the freight charges play so small a part that a one-third reduction amounts to three ten-thousandths of a cent per kilowatt-hour of power generated. This means a saving of 1 cent for every 3,300 kilowatt-hours used or, turning this around, the average residential consumer saves 1 cent every 5½ years as a result of reduced freight rates granted T. V. A. He would have to pay power bills for more than 50 years to net himself a dime.

WHY T. V. A. ELECTRIC RATES ARE LOW

The T. V. A. in its electric operations submits to all legitimate charges to which a private utility would be subjected. Its success in making available cheap electricity lies in the cost assumed by some private utilities which T. V. A. does not pay. A few of these may be mentioned. The attempt to pay dividends on the $1,400,000,000 of write-ups exposed by the Federal Trade Commission, expensive campaigns to influence legislation, excessive fees to affiliated engineering and management companies as well as the tremendous salaries paid to officers of both the holding companies and the operating companies.

DONALD R. RICHBERG

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, it had been my hope during the course of the day to have an opportunity to obtain recognition to address the Senate as briefly as may be upon what I consider the most brazen exhibition of impudence on the part of a bureaucratic official that has fallen under my observation during my lifetime. I refer to the exhibition by a bureaucrat—thank God, a temporary bureaucrat!—Mr. Donald R. Richberg, in calling together yesterday some 1,500 of his own appointees, and abusing the Senate of the United States and the Congress of the United States for assuming to perform the functions ascribed to them by the Constitution of the United States.

As I say, to my mind that is the most amazing exhibition of impudence which has fallen under my observation in my lifetime.

Owing to the length of the daily diatribe of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Long], it has been impossible for me to gain recognition today; and I do not desire to address the Senate at this time upon the matter to which I have referred. I give notice, however, that tomorrow, as soon after the meeting of the Senate as I may be able to obtain recognition, I desire to address the Senate very briefly on the subject of Mr. Donald R. Richberg and his ambition to be a Mussolini in the United States.

SETTLEMENT OF LABOR DISPUTES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1958) to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, to diminish the causes of labor disputes, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask to have the first committee amendment stated, so that it may be pending before the Senate for consideration at the meeting of the Senate tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first committee amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, line 3, it is proposed to insert in the subtitle the words "findings and."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. WALSH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCGILL in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting several nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. MCKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of several postmasters.

Mr. HATCH, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, reported favorably the nomination of Leo F. Sanchez, of New Mexico, to be register of the land office at Santa Fe, N. Mex., vice Maurice F. Miera, resigned.

Mr. COPELAND, from the Committee on Commerce, reported favorably the nominations (for promotion) of the following officers in the Coast Guard:

Commander LeRoy Reinburg to be captain, to rank as such from May 1, 1935, in place of Capt. Herman H. Wolf, retired; and Lt. Comdr. Elmer F. Stone to be commander, to rank as such from May 1, 1935.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the first business in order on the calendar.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

This completes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. WALSH. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate, in legislative session, took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, May 16, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, MAY 15, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul.

It lays upon us solemn obligations; it enjoins obedience to the highest and best; it counsels righteousness and gives rich compensations. Almighty God, may we heed its call. Let us be severely true with ourselves by cultivating impartiality of judgment, sincerity of demeanor and action. With so many, blessed Father of mercy, this world means toil and trial; they climb the steep, barren, and rugged ways of life. We beseech Thee to sanctify their misfortunes; cheer them with Thy presence and help them to learn how to break forth into sweet song. Mercifully regard those who are prosperous and happy; deny them not of these blessings. The Lord God lead them to understand that every man's surplus is another one's need. Out of their abundant store may rich treasures of comfort and contentment overflow to others. Spare us from that egotism that blinds us to our brother's right and violates his property, reputation, and happiness. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on May 8, 1935, the President approved and signed joint resolutions of the House of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 273. Joint resolution extending the gratitude of the Nation to Admiral Byrd and to the members of his expedition; and

H. J. Res. 274. Joint resolution authorizing the appointment of a special joint committee to meet with other representatives of the Government in greeting Rear Admiral Richard E. Byrd upon his return from his second Antarctic expedition.

PRESIDENT'S FARM ADDRESS

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday afternoon the President of the United States addressed a gathering of 5,000 farmers on the White House lawn. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting that militant speech.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday 5,000 farmers from 25 States came to Washington, at their own expense, in order to express their deep gratitude and appreciation to the President and the Agricultural Adjustment Administration for the agricultural program. The like of this great demonstration has never before been witnessed in Washington. It was a fine and truly representative body of farmers, who from the depths of their hearts came here to attest to a program that is today restoring American agriculture. While it could be properly termed a meeting of thanksgiving, this great assemblage let it be understood in no uncertain tones that this program must go on, and that they would stand like a stone wall against all efforts to weaken or destroy it.

Gathered on the lawn of the White House yesterday afternoon, they were addressed by the President of the United States, the man who is both their hope and inspiration. I take pleasure in extending my remarks by inserting this militant speech.

THE TEXT OF THE PRESIDENT'S FARM SPEECH—THIRD YEAR OF POLICY OF ADJUSTMENT BEGUN, HE POINTS OUT

I am glad to welcome you to the National Capital. We can think of this occasion as a kind of surprise birthday party, for it was just 2 years and 2 days ago that the Agricultural Adjustment Act became a law. And I well remember the fine group of representatives of farmers from every part of the Union who stood around me on that occasion when I signed the act.

In record time you and thousands of other farmers took hold and set up machinery to control your own affairs and put the new law to work.

I remember, too, the many high and mighty people who said you could not do it—that it was no use for you to try—intimating clearly that their only remedy to improve your situation was to let the sheriffs' sales go on. That was the old and very familiar way the high and mighty balanced farm production with demand. Those people did not understand and many of them do not understand today that, if the farm population of the United States suffers and loses its purchasing power, the people in the cities, of necessity, suffer with them. One of the greatest lessons that the city dwellers have come to understand in this past 2 years is this: Empty pocketbooks on the farm don't turn factory wheels in the city.

Go back for a minute to the spring of 1933—when there was a huge carry-over of almost 13,000,000 bales and a price, because of that carry-over, of 6 cents a pound. You and I know what 6-cent cotton means to the purchasing power of the Cotton Belt.

There was a huge carry-over of tobacco and the price of tobacco during the preceding 6 months was the lowest on record for many years—wheat, with a carry-over of nearly 400,000,000 bushels, and a price of 35 cents on the farm; corn, with a price of 15 cents a bushel on many farms; hogs, selling at 3 cents a pound.

You and I know what that meant in the way of purchasing power for 40,000,000 people.

When we came to Washington we were faced with three possible programs. The first involved price fixing by Government decree. This was discarded because the problem of overproduction was not solved thereby.

DUMPING POLICY SHUNNED

The second was a plan to let farmers grow as much as they wanted to and to have the Federal Government then step in, take from them that portion of their crop which represented the exportable surplus and, in their name, on their behalf, dump this surplus on the other nations of the world. That plan was discarded because the other nations of the world had already begun to stop dumping. With increasing frequency they were raising their tariffs, establishing quotas, and clamping on embargoes against just that kind of proposition.

Therefore, we came to the third plan—a plan for the adjustment of totals in our major crops so that from year to year production and consumption would be kept in reasonable balance with each other to the end that reasonable prices would be paid to farmers for their crops and to the end that unwieldy surpluses would not depress our markets and upset the balance.

We are now at the beginning of the third year of carrying out this policy. You know the results thus far attained. You know the price of cotton, of wheat, of tobacco, of corn, of hogs, and of other farm products today. Further comment on the successful partial attainment of our objective up to this time is unnecessary on my part—you know.

I want to emphasize that word "adjustment." As you know, a great many of the high and mighty—with special axes to grind—have been deliberately trying to mislead people who know nothing of farming by misrepresenting—no, why use a pussyfoot word—by lying about the kind of a farm program under which this Nation is operating today.

LED ASTRAY BY IGNORANCE

A few leading citizens have gone astray from ignorance. I must admit it. For example, the prominent city banker who was driving through upstate New York with me 4 or 5 years ago in the late fall. Everything was brown. The leaves were off the trees. We passed a beautiful green field. He asked me what it was. I told him it was winter wheat. He turned to me and said, "That is very interesting. I have always wondered about winter wheat. What I don't understand is how they are able to cut it when it gets all covered up with snow."

The other was the editor of a great metropolitan paper. He visited me down in Georgia when the cotton was nearly grown, but before the bolls had formed. Looking out over the cotton fields, he said to me:

"What a great number of raspberries they grow down here."

Raspberries was right. At 4½ cents a pound for cotton, his mistake was perhaps a natural one.

I was speaking of adjustment. It is your duty and mine to continue to educate the people of this country to the fact that adjustment means not only adjustment downward but adjustment upward. If you and I agree on a correct figure for a normal carry-over, it means that if we have a bumper crop one year we will by mutual consent reduce the next year's crop in order to even up that carry-over. At the same time, if we get a short crop in a given year, you and I agree to increase the next year's crop to make up the shortage. That is exactly what we are doing today in the case of wheat.

NOT PLOWING UNDER

It is high time for you and me to carry by education knowledge of the fact that not a single program of the A. A. A. contemplated the destruction of an acre of feed crops in the United States, in spite of what you may read or be told by people who have special axes to grind.

It is high time for you and for me to make clear that we are not plowing under cotton this year—that we did not plow it under in 1934, and that we only plowed some of it under in 1933 because the Agricultural Adjustment Act was passed after a huge crop of cotton was already in the ground.

It is high time for us to repeat on every occasion that we have not wastefully destroyed food in any form. It is true that the Relief Administrator has purchased hundreds of thousands of tons of foodstuffs to feed the needy and hungry who are on the relief rolls in every part of the United States.

The crocodile tears shed by the professional mourners of an old and obsolete order over the slaughter of little pigs and other measures to reduce surplus agricultural inventories deceive very few thinking people, and least of all the farmers themselves.

CITES DESTINY OF HOGS

The acknowledged destiny of a pig is sausage, or ham, or bacon, or pork. In these forms, millions of pigs were consumed by vast numbers of needy people who otherwise would have had to do without.

Let me make one other point clear for the benefit of the millions in cities who have to buy meats. Last year the Nation suffered a drought of unparalleled intensity. If there had been no Government program, if the old order had obtained in 1933 and 1934, that drought on the cattle ranges of America and in the Corn Belt would have resulted in the marketing of thin cattle, immature hogs and in the death of these animals on the range and on the farm. Then we would have had a vastly greater shortage than we face today.

Our program saved the lives of millions of head of livestock. They are still on the range. Other millions are today canned and ready for the country to eat.

I think that you and I are agreed in seeking a continuance of a national policy which on the whole is proving successful. The memory of old conditions under which the product of a whole year's work often would not bring you the cost of transporting it to market is too fresh in your minds to let you be led astray by the solemn admonitions and specious lies of those who in the past profited most when your distress was greatest.

PRICES STILL HELD INSUFFICIENT

You remember, and I remember, that not so long ago the poor had less food to eat and less clothes to wear and that was at a time when you had to practically give away your products. Then the surpluses were greater and yet the poor were poorer than they are today and when you farmers are getting a reasonable although still an insufficient price.

I have not the time to talk with you about many other policies of your Government which affect the farm population of the country. I have not the time to go into the practical work of the Farm Credit Administration which in all of its ramifications has saved a million farms from foreclosure and has accomplished the first great reduction in exorbitant interest rates that this country has ever known.

Because your cause is so just no one has had the temerity to question the motives of your "march on Washington." It is a good omen for Government, for business, for bankers, and for the city dwellers that the Nation's farmers are becoming articulate and that they know whereof they speak.

I hope you have enjoyed your stay in Washington. Seeing your Government at first hand, you may have a better idea why its efforts at times seem lumbering and slow and complicated. On the other hand, you may have seen that we are moving faster and accomplishing more practical results than you have been led to believe by the high and mighty gentlemen I have spoken of. I want to thank you for your patience with us. I want to pledge our whole-hearted cooperation as you go forward.

KETCHIKAN, ALASKA

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I am in receipt of the following letter from the Secretary of the Interior advising of the loss of enrolled bill H. R. 6084, authorizing a bond issue for the town of Ketchikan, Alaska:

I regret to report the loss of enrolled bill H. R. 6084, authorizing a bond issue of Ketchikan, Alaska, which was delivered to my office on May 3 by a messenger from the White House. The bill was receipted for by a messenger at my door, who has no recollection, however, of this particular document. The practice is for the messenger to deliver enrolled bills to the man in charge of the incoming mail for my office, who sends them to the file room for recording. There is no record of the receipt of this bill by the recording clerk. In fact, a thorough search of the entire Department, including Public Works, has failed to discover the bill, and no one has any recollection of having handled it. I have caused everyone to search all papers in and on their desks, but without result. I am chagrined to have to report the loss of this bill in spite of the care with which enrolled bills are handled in the Department. I recommend that you ask the Congress to authorize the preparation of a duplicate. The last approval day is tomorrow, May 15.

In the circumstances, I recommend that a duplicate bill be authorized by concurrent resolution.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 15, 1935.

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following concurrent resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 21

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate be, and they are hereby, authorized to sign a duplicate copy of the enrolled bill H. R. 6084, entitled "An act to authorize the city of Ketchikan, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum not to exceed $1,000,000 for the purpose of acquiring the electric light and power, water, and telephone properties of the Citizens' Light, Power & Water Co., and to finance and operate the same, and validating the preliminary proceedings with respect thereto, and for other purposes", and that the Clerk of the House be directed to transmit the same to the President of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, what department was this lost in?

Mr. DIMOND. According to the letter, it was lost in the Department of the Interior.

Mr. SNELL. Is that the same Department that lost $50,000,000, which was afterwards found to have been used for relief purposes? Probably the bill will be found in somebody's hip pocket later, and if it is so found, what becomes of it?

The SPEAKER. It will not be signed.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, that is the Department in which all of my requests for jobs are lost, and it is probably mixed up with some of them. [Laughter.]

Mr. SNELL. That being so, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, there is precedent for the signing of a duplicate bill. On February 3, 1921, a similar situation arose, and a duplicate bill was signed.

Mr. SNELL. We are not objecting.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, did I understand the Clerk to read that this involves a bond issue of $100,000,000?

The SPEAKER. One million dollars. Is there objection? There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL COPIES OF HEARINGS—ECONOMIC SECURITY ACT

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 14, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate concurrent resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 14

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the Printing Act approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Finance of the Senate be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed 1,000 additional copies of the hearings held before the committee during the current session on the bill S. 1130, the Economic Security Act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to; and a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

GEORGIA'S ANSWER TO HER GOVERNOR

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by placing therein a copy of a speech I delivered over the radio last evening.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by me over the radio last evening:

My friends, I wish, at the outset, to express my appreciation of the courtesy extended me by the Columbia Broadcasting System in permitting me to address you.

I appear as a Member of Congress from Georgia to answer a recent address made over this system by Governor Talmadge, of that State, in the hope that I may set right the people of the State in the eyes of the Nation.

Governor Talmadge did not speak for the people of Georgia in his bitter attack upon President Roosevelt and his administration. He spoke for himself alone and for motives which will subsequently become apparent.

The speech the Governor made was little more than a fault-finding tirade and would be of no importance except for the fact that it is an attack upon a Democratic President by a Democratic Governor of a rock-ribbed Democratic State in which the President makes his part-time home.

No one would deny to the Governor the right of criticism. Independence of thought and willingness to make public declaration of views are to be commended wherever found, but there is a broad distinction between legitimate criticism and what the Governor has done—as broad as the difference between lawful procedure and anarchy.

As a Member of Congress I have indulged in criticisms myself but have undertaken to make them advisory rather than destructive. I have not accepted without resistance all the measures offered with Presidential sanction. I opposed the adoption of the National Industrial Recovery Act, and I think upon good and substantial grounds, and have not changed my views. I did not support the $4,000,000,000 unemployment relief bill because I thought it placed a burden upon the future which the needs of the present did not justify. I have complained of what I have taken to be a tendency toward the centralization of too much power in the Federal Government through a too liberal interpretation of the Constitution, but I have recognized that the country has been in a state of emergency and quick and effective relief has demanded direct and vigorous treatment which has called for concentration of authority and power.

Governor Talmadge condemned in no unmistakable words the relief activities of the administration as extravagant waste, yet this same Governor within 2 weeks before he addressed you, wrote letters to every Member of the Georgia delegation in Congress pleading for a direct grant of $2,000,000 for the university system in Georgia. Governor Talmadge enjoys the distinction of being the first executive of any State in the Union out of whose hands the right to administer relief was taken. His whole grievance against the administration dates back to this incident. It was alleged that he was undertaking to make a political organization out of the State relief forces; that his then executive secretary, who is now commissioner of agriculture and advocating secession from the Union, was on the relief rolls, although at the same time he was drawing a sizeable salary from the State of Georgia. There were other similar complaints which need not be detailed.

Governor Talmadge condemned the activities of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration as a program of scarcity. He insists that farmers should be permitted to produce to the limit of their capacity, and yet while he was commissioner of agriculture he joined with Senator Long, then Governor of Louisiana, in inaugurating the first movement for a cotton holiday in the South. It seems paradoxical to disclose at this late date that Senator Long, as Governor of Louisiana, had his legislature pass a law prohibiting cotton growers of that fertile and productive State from planting a stalk of cotton in 1931, and after the Louisiana Legislature had passed this dictatorial act, Senator Long, who was then Governor of the State, called upon all the Southern States to join in the movement, and his representative in Georgia was Governor Talmadge, then Commissioner of Agriculture.

Governor Talmadge called a mass meeting of farmers in Atlanta at that time and made every effort to force Governor Russell, who is now Senator from Georgia, to call an extraordinary session of the State legislature and fall in line with Louisiana by passing a law to prohibit the farmer of Georgia from planting a stalk of cotton during an entire year. We now find these two distinguished gentlemen, Senator Long and Governor Talmadge, as the leading critics of the agricultural adjustment program, condemning administration benefits to the farmer as a fallacious program of scarcity and attempting to tell the farmer that the abolishment of the present program would result in better prices for his products. In this connection it will interest you to know that there is today in Washington a delegation of more than a thousand farmers from the State of Georgia who have come here to protest the speech of Governor Talmadge, to express confidence in the President and approval of the administration's farm program.

The task of the A. A. A. has been that of coordinating the efforts of the American farmer to win his way back to a place in the American economy. In the 2 years following March 15, 1933, prices of the seven farm commodities originally named as basic in the Agricultural Adjustment Act—cotton, tobacco, hogs, corn, wheat, rice, and milk—more than doubled. In 1933, $162,000,000 in rental and benefits were paid to farmers cooperating in the adjustment program, and in 1934, five hundred and fifty-six millions were paid in rental and benefit payments and drought livestock purchases, bringing the total cash income from $4,328,000,000 in 1932 to $5,051,000,000 in 1933, and to $6,090,000,000 in 1934.

Now, what about Georgia?

In 1932 receipts from farm marketings yielded Georgia farmers $58,311,000, but by 1934 receipts rose to $95,886,000, and with $14,215,000 of rental and benefit payments the total returns were $110,101,000. In other words, Georgia's farm cash income for 1934 represented a gain of 90 percent over their farm cash income of 1932. In addition to this, up to February 1, 1933, Georgia cotton growers had received $5,060,261 on cotton options held by them, as a result of the 1933 cotton program, and up to the same date Georgia farmers had taken advantage of the cotton loan to borrow $42,255,149 on 701,072 bales of cotton. What has happened in Georgia is typical of what has happened in every other agricultural State.

The increase in this well-being of the farmer that followed the improvement in farm income just mentioned meant not only that the farmer has been able to buy more of the things he needs than he has for a number of years, but the city workers have in turn profited by the revival of markets due to his purchases.

These are some of the benefits that have flown to the farmer and the country as a direct result of the agricultural program, but still Governor Talmadge says it is all wrong and should not continue, that it is a program of scarcity, that it stagnates business and is hurtful to the farmer. I am unable to see how the farmer is hurt by doubling his income on the same investment and effort. I am sure that Governor Talmadge has no conscious intention of hurting the farmer. He has simply gotten into water that is over his head and rather than call for help he is willing to drown.

The Governor has threatened to campaign the country against the processing tax, but even if he should give up this proposed trip and decide to stay at home he cannot get by with telling the farmers that "the processing tax has stagnated the cotton industry in America and is causing the importation of cotton here every day." The figures on cotton imports for the 7 months ending February 1935 and the comparison with the same 7 months last year happen to be as follows:

Cotton unmanufactured, imports for consumption, by countries of production, for 7 months ending February—

Country of production	1934	1935
	Pounds	Pounds
Mexico.....	680,492	508,869
British West Indies.....	13,107	4,496
Argentina.....	2,737
Brazil.....	1,608
Peru.....	1,578,694	345,050
British India.....	5,576,875	6,995,055
China.....	6,118,838	1,297,123
Netherlands India.....	209,726	157,560
British West Africa.....	31,574
Egypt.....	26,530,230	22,950,204
Total.....	40,742,274	32,250,966

Neither can the Governor get by with bewailing that the "thousands of cotton goods and fabrics that were once made in America and shipped to China and Japan are now made in China and Japan and shipped back here to the United States on account of this foolish processing tax", when the cotton farmers know well enough that imported raw cotton pays the same processing tax as domestic cotton when it is made up in an American mill, and when they know equally well that imported cotton textiles pay a compensating tax equal to our domestic processing tax, in addition to the regular tariff.

In addition to this, nothing would be more foolish than shutting out imports of cotton goods from Japan which is but a fraction of 1 percent of domestic production when Japan is the world's best customer for American cotton.

The Governor objects to all activities of the Government that compete with private enterprise. This puts him in opposition to the development of Muscle Shoals and makes him unwittingly a special pleader for the Power Trust and fertilizer combine which for many years succeeded in the killing off all legislation making use of this Government property. It puts him in opposition to the services that this development is intended to render—cheap fertilizer, rural electrification, and cheap power. Take the Government out of business, the Governor demands. Let me ask him what would have become of the distressed farm owners and home owners if the Government had not come to their rescue. He, of course, knows that the insurance companies, building and loan associations, and other lending agencies would own them all by now.

If the Government is in business, it is because business had failed and the country had to be saved. It was business that first obtained security through governmental aid. Big business that 2 years ago came to Washington with hat in hand, now haughtily demands that the recovery program under which it was saved cease, and Governor Talmadge joins in asking that this be done.

In his frenzied attack upon the President, Governor Talmadge has thrown himself into the very arms of big business, for it is from this source that comes greatest objection to the effort being made to give some kind of relief and security to people who toil. I am opposed to the regimentation of business and of life. I believe in government by law and not by men; but a state of war demands war measures, and until we come out of the slump into which the country has fallen we will have to put up with things with which we are unaccustomed. There is no intention anywhere to filch from the people their liberties, but, on the other hand, the determination to make them secure in the enjoyment of all their natural and legal rights.

Governor Talmadge blames the administration for the continued unemployment of thousands of unfortunate people and in the same breath he damns the President for relief activities which are designed to give these unfortunates a temporary means of living until they can be absorbed by industry. He complains of millions of dollars being spent for relief, but he fails to mention the widespread suffering that would result but for this humanitarian policy. He manifests greater concern in the profits of business than in the lives of the people. What would he do for the poor? There is no work to be had and they cannot live on grass.

In denouncing the administration farm program as an effort to build prosperity from scarcity, he fails to refer to the miserable economic conditions prevailing in American agriculture when large surpluses in cotton, wheat, and other major commodities depressed prices to the point where farmers were unable to recover the cost of their operations. In making the false claim that curtailment of acreage put millions of people off the farms, he said nothing of the tremendous increase in farm revenue that has resulted from this acreage curtailment. Perhaps his major recommendation for restoring normal conditions is the laughable suggestion that the Agricultural Adjustment Act be abolished and all outstanding contracts to the farmers be paid off and agriculture be forced to return to the old unorganized status it occupied during the early days of the depression. If this were done, a rule of ruin would follow. Expansion of acreage would be the first step, overproduction would ensue, the Government's policy of making commodity loans would be abandoned, market prices would collapse, and in less than a year American agriculture would find itself back in the depth of despair from which it is just now emerging.

The Governor has apparently overlooked the fact that the problem that confronted the President in 1932 was a complex one. That among other things it involved both recovery and reform. Recovery could have unquestionably been accomplished more speedily had all effort been concentrated upon that single phase of the problem, but the opportunity for reform would have passed, and reform was essential to the general good as recovery.

New treatment for both old and new problems had to be applied, and this called for experimentation which involved error. Errors have, of course, been made. In so vast an undertaking as saving the country from rack and ruin, calling for the speedy setting up of new machinery for administration purposes and the expenditure of huge sums of money, error was inevitable. No reasonable person would have expected such an undertaking to be free of inequalities, injustices, and waste. The question is: Have general conditions improved under the treatment that has been applied?

The Governor would judge things upon the basis of their weaknesses rather than their strength. His demand is for perfection in everything. Because of a lack of infallibility on the part of the President and perfection in the institutions and men set up and appointed to administer governmental affairs, he would hold that the President has been a complete failure and would set him aside and have another elevated to this high station, and the Governor seemingly intended, in this connection, to invite attention to himself.

The controlling passion of the President, as gathered from his public utterances and what he has done, has been to save America, and in the prosecution of this lofty and noble purpose he has probably found it necessary to accept as temporary expedients things that he would oppose being made permanent policies of government. The effort has been to give emphasis to the fact that government is the concern of all, that it is a social union, that it exists not alone for the protection of property but for the protection of person and property and all the good that government can be made to bestow. It is in the light of actualities that we must judge if we hope to judge rightly. The laying down of broad general principles of justice upon which to ground a rule of governmental conduct is not a simple undertaking.

Is it to be understood that the Governor has teased himself into the funny position of bidding for three nominations? A place on the national Democratic ticket, or if that cannot be had then on the Republican ticket, and if that be denied him then a place on the ticket of any third party that may come along? To be a contender for any one of these places a candidate should be able to start out with the support of his own State which in this instance will never be the case, for Georgia has but one candidate for the Presidency in 1936, and that candidate is the President himself.

But as serious as is the political apostasy of the Governor, his most grievous offense was his violation of all laws of decency and propriety committed in a recent speech in which he derisively referred to the physical infirmities of the President. For this one offense, if for none other, public sentiment should lash him out of public life.

CRITICS OF A. A. A.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, the President's denunciation of the critics of his destructive A. A. A. policies as liars includes a very wide category of Democrats and initiates a New Deal Ananias Club, including Senators Glass, Byrd, Tydings, Bailey, George, Walsh, Gore, Copeland, and Long, and Governor Talmadge of Georgia, Bainbridge Colby, former Democratic Secretary of State, Alfred E. Smith, John W. Davis, Albert C. Ritchie, Newton D. Baker and, lastly, Father Coughlin, who has been one of the severest and bitterest critics of the A. A. A. program, and practically all of New England.

One of the main pledges of the new-deal administration was to promote the export of our agricultural products, but instead, because of the half-baked program of the A. A. A., the export of wheat, cotton, pork, and other farm produce has reached a vanishing point.

"Whom the gods would destroy, they first make mad." Confused and confounded by the marked swing away from the unsound and socialistic new-deal policies, the President lost his head—and that is the mildest term that can be applied—when he called his critics "liars." The facts are seeping through to the people in spite of the radio barrage of the "new dealers" and honeyed words and sugar-coated phrases of the President in his fireside chats, that the impractical, visionary, and magical schemes of the Wallaces, Tugwells, and Ezekiels to destroy crops, regulate the birth control of pigs, and provide a program of scarcity when there are more than 11,000,000 unemployed and over 20,000,000 Americans on relief, have increased unemployment and lost our world markets for wheat and cotton, formerly our greatest sources of real wealth.

Naturally the cotton farmers, with cotton pegged at 12 cents, have flocked to Washington to applaud the President for temporary benefits, regardless of the fact that they are following the "new deal pied pipers" in a dance of death toward vanishing world markets and ruin and desolation for the South. If the cotton farmers and the South want to commit economic suicide for temporary profit, that is their business, but it does not change the facts by one jot or tittle. Lenin was right when he said that the capitalists would commit suicide for temporary profit, and that applies to the farmers as well. The cotton farmers have already lost over 50 percent of the world markets and will lose the balance to Brazil, Egypt, India, and Soviet Russia within the next 2 years, bringing economic and financial ruin to the South. The wheat export markets have already been lost and we are importing more wheat than we export, and shiploads of oats, corn, and rye are being unloaded in the United States at the present time. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes to reply to the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States is the President of the whole United States. He is the Democrats' President. He is the Republicans' President. For months he has been working day and night in the interest of the American people. When the President's shoulders are bowed down just now with the great burdens of government, I cannot conceive of the kind of man who will get up on this floor day after day and try to hamstring him. [Applause on Democratic side.] He deserves a little encouragement once in a while, he deserves a little cooperation once in a while, he deserves efforts on both sides of this aisle to help hold up his hands in these trying times.

But the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] has to get up and take his swipe at him; and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] has to get up and take his swipe at him; and now the new tentative leader, the tentative candidate for President on the Republican side, Mr. FISH, has got to take his political swipe at the President.

Mr. Speaker, I wish these gentlemen on the other side of the aisle could have attended a banquet at the Mayflower Hotel last night, where 710 farmers from the great State of Texas met to thank and eulogize their President. They did not want anything, they did not come here to demand anything, but they came here merely to thank the Congress and the President for what the Congress and the President have done for them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I have been here for 18 years in Congress. This is the first time I have ever heard of the American people being so full of gratitude to their President and to their Congress that they would make a trip of 2,000 miles, at their own expense, to thank their Congress and thank their President and his administration for giving them a square deal.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. It is time this sniping ought to stop; it is time this shooting from ambush ought to stop. Even the people of Potsdam do not appreciate it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, my only thought in getting this time is this: After listening to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] make his wonderful appeal to the Membership of the House to stand by and support the President, I am wondering whether or not gentlemen on his side of the aisle are going to support the President in his position on the bonus.

Mr. BLANTON. No, we are not; but that has nothing to do with it, because we are not attacking him and we are not sniping at him all the time.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

FRED C. AINSWORTH ENDOWMENT LIBRARY

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for half a minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, the late Gen. Fred C. Ainsworth left a bequest of $10,000 to establish in Walter Reed Hospital the Fred C. Ainsworth Library. The Judge Advocate General of the Army has held that action by Congress permitting the War Department to accept this money to have the library established is necessary.

Unless acceptance is made by the 5th of June the bequest will fail. It is, therefore, an emergency that we take up and pass this bill.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, for the present consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 98, to authorize the acceptance on behalf of the United States of the bequest of the late Maj. Gen. Fred C. Ainsworth for the purpose of establishing a permanent library at the Walter Reed General Hospital to be known as the "Fred C. Ainsworth Endowment Library."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 98, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the adjutant Walter Reed General Hospital be, and is hereby, authorized to accept the bequest of the late Maj. Gen. Fred C. Ainsworth, or such amount thereof as is available, as contained in his last will and testament, and such interest as may have accrued on the funds covered by such bequest, and to receipt therefor on behalf of the United States, and to deposit the funds so received in the Treasury of the United States as a special fund dedicated to the purpose of establishing a permanent library at the Walter Reed General Hospital, to be known as the "Fred C. Ainsworth Endowment Library", said fund to be subject to disbursement for such purpose upon vouchers submitted by the adjutant Walter Reed General Hospital and to be available until expended: Provided, That the Treasurer of the United States, upon the written request of the adjutant Walter Reed General Hospital so to do, is authorized to invest and reinvest any part or all of the corpus of this bequest, as well as any income therefrom, in interest-bearing United States Government bonds, and retain custody thereof, if, in the judgment of the adjutant it will best serve the objects of the bequest: Provided further, That the Treasurer of the United States, upon the written request of the adjutant Walter Reed General Hospital so to do, is authorized to dispose of, for cash, any part or all of any bonds in which such funds may be invested, and redeposit the proceeds thereof, as well as all interest received from time to time upon any such bonds, to the credit of such special fund and subject to withdrawal and disbursement and reinvestment, as above provided for: And provided further, That the administration, control, and expenditure of this fund and its application to the purposes intended shall be according to the sole discretion of the adjutant Walter Reed General Hospital, and the exercise of his discretion and authority in regard thereto and his decision thereon shall not be subject to question or review except by the Secretary of War and courts of competent jurisdiction.

Sec. 2. The necessary space or a separate room in any building at the Walter Reed General Hospital is authorized to be set aside for the purpose of establishing the said library.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate joint resolution?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, as I understand, it is necessary to have a resolution of this kind, in order to take advantage of the bequest?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. That is the opinion of the Judge Advocate General, stated to the War Department, and conveyed in a letter from the Secretary of War to the Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House joint resolution was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution and a bill of the following titles in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. J. Res. 113. Joint resolution to extend until April 1, 1936, the provisions of title I of the National Industrial Recovery Act, and for other purposes.

S. 2357. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to improve the navigability and to provide for the flood control of the Tennessee River; to provide for reforestation and the proper use of marginal lands in the Tennessee Valley; to provide for the agricultural and industrial development of said valley; to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals in the State of Alabama, and for other purposes", approved May 18, 1933.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to a concurrent resolution of the House of the following title:

H. Con. Res. 21. Concurrent resolution authorizing the Speaker of the House to sign a duplicate copy of the enrolled bill H. R. 6084.

RESEARCH IN CONNECTION WITH AGRICULTURAL COMMODITIES

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7160) to provide for research into basic laws and principles relating to agriculture and to provide for the further development of co-operative agricultural extension work and the more complete endowment and support of land-grant colleges.

This is a bill for research and land-grant colleges. It has the unanimous report of the committee. I feel that there is no opposition to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill H. R. 7160, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, as far as the bill itself is concerned, I do not know that there is any objection to it. I do not see the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE], ranking minority member of the Committee on Agriculture, present.

Mr. JONES. I spoke to the gentleman from Kansas about it. He did not know it was coming up just at this time, but he helped prepare the bill and is supporting it. I telephoned his office. He is on his way. I notice there are other members of the committee on the minority side present.

Mr. SNELL. Is there any explanation that should be made in connection with the bill?

Mr. JONES. I will be glad to make any explanation.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Reserving the right to object, is this one of the bills for which the gentleman has requested a rule?

Mr. JONES. No; I have not requested a rule on this. I may have listed it as one of the bills we wanted to take up, but this is the land-grant and research bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman requested a rule on another bill which had a unanimous report, and it was stated there was no objection to it. It was unanimously reported and everybody was for it, but at the hearing before the Rules Committee some objection arose. That is the forestry bill. It is being held up awaiting further explanation.

Mr. JONES. I do not think I listed that bill. I think the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER] listed that.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Many of these bills that are reported out unanimously by committees develop much controversy before the Rules Committee.

Mr. JONES. That rarely happens in matters reported by our committee.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am not going to object, but in my opinion this is not the way to enact legislation.

Mr. JONES. I was simply trying to save time for the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SNELL. What is to be the program for today? As I understood it, the Committee on Agriculture had the call.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday. The committees will be called as soon as the House disposes of business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. JONES. The Foreign Affairs Committee desires to take up several bills.

Mr. SNELL. I understood the Committee on Agriculture had the call.

Mr. JONES. If this bill is passed, we will be out of the way. We will present nothing further today.

Mr. SNELL. And the gentleman's committee will lose its call.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The Foreign Affairs Committee will take up the balance of the day. They have enough bills to take up the balance of the day.

Mr. JONES. The Committee on Foreign Affairs will have the call, and I was trying to save time for them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture just what this bill provides?

Mr. JONES. This bill provides for two things: It provides for research into problems affecting agriculture, and a search for new markets and new uses. It also provides additional funds for the land-grant colleges.

Mr. TRUAX. Does it involve any additional appropriation?

Mr. JONES. Yes. For the research it involves at the start $1,000,000 a year, gradually increasing to $5,000,000. Then it also provides for an additional fund for the land-grant colleges, beginning with an $8,000,000 annual appropriation and increases to twelve million. I think the gentleman's own State has a land-grant college.

Mr. TRUAX. Yes. That is the reason I am interested. Mr. JONES. It provides additional funds made necessary by reason of the administration of the farm program.

Mr. TRUAX. Can the gentleman enlighten me as to the research work, just what field will be entered?

Mr. JONES. The research will be into basic lines of agriculture. Sixty percent of the research funds will be allocated to the States, to be matched by the States, the research conducted by the States, into problems of marketing and new uses, and laws and principles affecting agriculture generally. Sixty percent of that money will be allocated to the various States, to be matched by the States.

Mr. TRUAX. And it will go to the colleges and experiment stations?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. Are those all the agencies that will secure this money?

Mr. JONES. Those are all the agencies that will secure this money that is allocated to the States for the extension service. Then a percentage of the research fund is left to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, 20 percent to be spent wherever he sees fit, and 20 percent in regional investigations in various regions.

Mr. TRUAX. I wonder if the gentleman would welcome a suggestion that part of these funds be used for researching more intensely into the cost of production of basic commodities? I think we are all interested in that.

Mr. JONES. The Secretary could do that out of this fund. It covers in a broad way research into the basic laws of production, the quality and improved methods of production, as well as the search for new uses and new markets.

Mr. TRUAX. It could be done?

Mr. JONES. In my judgment it could be done; yes. The Secretary will have discretion in a broad way in the use of these research funds.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear the distinguished gentleman from Texas say that it can be done. If we had less professorial research and less professional "bug" hunters on Government pay rolls, it would then be possible to determine each year with great accuracy the farm cost of production of each basic agricultural commodity. This would provide an opportunity for real and lasting service to farmers of untold value. Tell us, without guessing, what it costs to raise a bushel of wheat, a bushel of corn, a hundred pounds of pork, and a hundred pounds of beef; then, and then only, can we expect national legislation by the Congress to guarantee to the farmer that cost plus a reasonable profit.

I always favor adequate appropriations for worth-while projects under the jurisdiction and direction of land-grant colleges. On the other hand, I am opposed to certain types of so-called "research work" conducted in the past under the supervision of the United States Department of Agriculture cooperating with the various experiment stations. I refer to the somewhat abortive attempt made in 1926, 1927, and 1928 to control the European cornborer. At that time millions of dollars were expended by both Federal and State governments.

One of the schemes tried out was an attempt to develop a type of corn that would be immune and act as a repellent to the attacks of the borer. Nearly $3,000,000 were spent by the United States Department of Agriculture in the purchase of tractors, trucks, plows, oil burners, and other machinery in the vain hope of destroying the borer by mechanical means, quite overlooking or ignoring the fact that the natural flight of the moths when they emerged from the larvae was the most prolific means of spreading the pest and cannot be stopped or controlled by human agencies or mechanical means. Needless to state that these attempts resulted in foredoomed failure.

Recently I received a copy of a speech by a Member of the Senate which listed more than 1,000 positions now held by college graduates in the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. I think it is wholly wrong to deny the same opportunities of employment to outstanding and forward-facing farmers simply because they have been denied the advantages of a college education and training. I hope that this apparent discrimination in favor of the college graduate which penalizes those farmers who have not had the time nor the means to attend college will be corrected in the near future.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objections.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand, the call lies with the Committee on Agriculture today unless the committee waives the call.

Mr. JONES. Yes; but there are a number of bills the Committee on Foreign Affairs desires to dispose of.

Mr. MICHENER. The Frazier-Lemke bill and the gentlemen's own bill, from his own committee affecting agriculture are on the calendar, and the rules of the House provide that on Calendar Wednesday the committee having the call may bring up such bills as the committee has reported out. Has the gentleman's committee taken action to waive its call on Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. JONES. No; the gentleman has not taken action to do that. We have a number of important bills on the calendar which are more or less controversial and which could not be finished in 1 day, and we feel there is no use wasting a lot of the time of the House. The gentleman understands that Calendar Wednesday is only for 1 day, and no important controversial bill can be passed in 1 day. There will be requests for rules on those various bills because they are controversial. They will excite a lot of discussion and it would be impossible to pass them in 1 day. It is not our policy to take up a lot of the time of the House in the consideration of controversial measures that could not be passed in a day. They must be brought up in the regular way so they can be finished.

Mr. MICHENER. If the gentleman is going to ask for rules on those bills, of course, that is a better way of bringing them up.

Mr. JONES. We will ask for rules on several bills.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered as read and be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.,

TITLE I

SECTION 1. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed to conduct scientific, technical, economic, and other research into basic laws and principles and processes relating to the improvement of the quality of, and the development of, new and improved methods of production of, distribution of, and new and extended uses and markets for, agricultural commodities and by-products and manufactures thereof. Research authorized under this section shall be in addition to research provided for under existing law (but both activities shall be coordinated so far as practicable) and shall be conducted by such agencies of the Department of Agriculture as the Secretary may designate or establish.

SEC. 2. The Secretary is also authorized and directed to encourage research similar to that authorized under section 1 to be conducted by agricultural experiment stations established or which may hereafter be established in pursuance of the act of March 2, 1887, providing for experiment stations, as amended and supplemented, by the allotment and payment as provided in section 5 to States and Territories for the use of such experiment stations of sums appropriated therefor pursuant to this title.

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this title there is authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000,000 for the fiscal year beginning after the date of the enactment of this title, and for each of the 4 fiscal years thereafter $1,000,000 more than the amount authorized for the preceding fiscal year, and $5,000,000 for each fiscal year thereafter. Moneys appropriated in pursuance of this title shall also be available for the purchase and rental of land and the construction of buildings necessary for conducting research provided for in this title, for the equipment and maintenance of such buildings, and for printing and disseminating the results of research. Sums appropriated in pursuance of this title shall be in addition to, and not in substitution for, appropriations for research or other activities of the Department of Agriculture and sums appropriated or otherwise made available for agricultural experiment stations.

SEC. 4. Forty percent of the sums appropriated for any fiscal year under section 3 shall be available for the purposes of section 1. The sums available for the purposes of section 1 shall be designated as the "Special research fund, Department of Agriculture", and no part of such special fund shall be used for the prosecution of research heretofore instituted or for the prosecution of any new research project except upon approval in writing by the Secretary. One-half of such special research fund shall be used by the Secretary for the establishment and maintenance of research laboratories and facilities in the major agricultural regions at places selected by him and for the prosecution, in accordance with section 1, of research at such laboratories.

SEC. 5. (a) Sixty percent of the sums appropriated for any fiscal year under section 3 shall be available for the purposes of section 2. The Secretary shall allot, for each fiscal year for which an appropriation is made, to each State and Territory an amount which bears the same ratio to the total amount to be allotted as the rural population of the State or Territory bears to the rural population of all the States and Territories as determined by the last preceding decennial census. No allotment and no payment under any allotment shall be made for any fiscal year in excess of the amount which the State or Territory makes available for such fiscal year out of its own funds for research and for the establishment and maintenance of necessary facilities for the prosecution of such research. If any State or Territory fails to make available for such purposes for any fiscal year a sum equal to the total amount to which it may be entitled for such year, the remainder of such amount shall be withheld by the Secretary. The total amount so withheld may be allotted by the Secretary of Agriculture to the States and Territories which make available for such year an amount equal to that part of the total amount withheld which may be allotted to them by the Secretary of Agriculture, but no such additional allotment to any State or Territory shall exceed the original allotment to such State or Territory for that year by more than 20 percent thereof.

(b) The sums authorized to be allotted to the States and Territories shall be paid annually in quarterly payments on July 1, October 1, January 1, and April 1. Such sums shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury upon warrant of the Secretary of Agriculture in the same manner and subject to the same administrative procedure set forth in the act of March 2, 1887, as amended June 7, 1888.

SEC. 6. As used in this title the term "Territory" means Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico.

SEC. 7. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out this act.

SEC. 8. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

TITLE II

SECTION 21. In order to further develop the cooperative extension system as inaugurated under the act entitled "An act to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and all acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture", approved May 8, 1914 (U. S. C., title 7, secs. 341-348), there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of paying the expenses of cooperative extension work in agriculture and home economics and the necessary printing and distribution of information in connection with the same, the sum of $8,000,000 for the fiscal year beginning after the date of the enactment of this title, and for the fiscal year following the first fiscal year for which an appropriation is made in pursuance of the foregoing authorization the additional sum of $1,000,000, and for each succeeding fiscal year thereafter an additional sum of $1,000,000 until the total appropriations authorized by this section shall amount to $12,000,000 annually, the authorization to continue in that amount for each succeeding fiscal year. The sums appropriated in pursuance of this section shall be paid to the several States and the Territory of Hawaii in the same manner and subject to the same conditions and limitations as the additional sums appropriated under the act of May 8, 1914, except that (1) the allotments to the several States and the Territory of Hawaii shall be in the proportion that the farm population of each bears to the total farm population of the several States and Hawaii, as determined by the last preceding decennial census, and (2) the several States and Hawaii shall not be required to offset the allotments authorized in this section. The sums appropriated pursuant to this section shall be in addition to, and not in substitution for, sums appropriated under such act of May 8, 1914, as amended and supplemented, or sums otherwise appropriated for agricultural extension work. Allotments to any State or Hawaii for any fiscal year from the appropriations herein authorized shall be available for payment to such State or Hawaii only if such State or Hawaii complies, for such fiscal year, with the provisions with reference to offset of appropriations (other than appropriations under this section) for agricultural extension work.

SEC. 22. In order to provide for the more complete endowment and support of the colleges in the several States entitled to the benefits of the act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts", approved July 2, 1862, as amended and supplemented (U. S. C., title 7, secs. 301-328; Supp. VII, sec. 304), there are hereby authorized to be ap-appropriated annually, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the following amounts:

(a) For the fiscal year beginning after the date of the enactment of this title, and for each fiscal year thereafter, $960,000; and

(b) For the fiscal year following the first fiscal year for which an appropriation is made in pursuance of paragraph (a), $500,000, and for each of the 2 fiscal years thereafter $500,000 more than the amount authorized to be appropriated for the preceding fiscal year, and for each fiscal year thereafter $1,500,000. The sums appropriated in pursuance of paragraph (a) shall be paid annually to the several States in equal shares. The sums appropriated in pursuance of paragraph (b) shall be in addition to sums appropriated in pursuance of paragraph (a) and shall be allotted and paid annually to each of the several States in the proportion which the total population of each such State bears to the total population of all the States, as determined by the last preceding decennial census. Sums appropriated in pursuance of this section shall be in addition to sums appropriated or authorized under such act of July 2, 1862, as amended and supplemented, and shall be applied only for the purposes of the colleges defined in such act, as amended and supplemented. The provisions of law applicable to the use and payment of sums under the act entitled "An act to apply a portion of the proceeds of the public lands to the more complete endowment and support of the colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts established under the provisions of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862", approved August 30, 1890, as amended and supplemented, shall apply to the use and payment of sums appropriated in pursuance of this section.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments. The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendments: Page 1, beginning in line 5, after the word "conduct", strike out the balance of line 5 and all of lines 6, 7, 8, and 9, and on page 2 all of line 1 to and including the word "thereof" in line 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "research into laws and principles underlying basic problems of agriculture in its broadest aspects; research relating to the improvement of the quality of and the development of new and improved methods of production of, distribution of, and new and extended uses and markets for, agricultural commodities and by-products and manufactures thereof; and research relating to the conservation, development, and use of land and water resources for agricultural purposes."

Page 3, line 20, after the figure "1", insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That not to exceed 2 percent of the sums appropriated may be used for the administration of section 5 of this title."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, in view of the brief discussion on the bill just passed, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to extend their own remarks on the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the cotton farmers are in Washington today and I am delighted that they are here. I wish that every Member from the Northern States and every Member from the Southern States, every Member who grows cotton, every Member who has a textile plant in his district, whether he be from the North or the South, at a big meeting of the Members and the cotton farmers could discuss our whole cotton problem. It is not a problem for the South alone, it is not a problem for the North alone. We need the South and the South needs us.

Those farmers who have their processing taxes know very well that if the northern markets are gone and if the southern mills lose their foreign market that King Cotton will be dethroned.

Mr. Speaker, the Chair realizes that the northern Members who have spoken have not said that the farmers should not be reimbursed for their cotton; they have said that the wheels of the cotton textile industry must turn, that the people must have work.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand why there have been the bitter attacks upon New England by the Secretary of Agriculture, by Members of Congress from the South. [Cries from the Democratic side of "Regular order!" "Regular order!"] You know very well, my friends on the Democratic side, that you need us just as we need you. We have cast no aspersions on the South or the southern workers, but many aspersions have been cast upon our manufacturers and upon our New England workers of foreign descent, who are so fine. I am pleading for the whole country, Mr. Speaker, not for just my section.

Mr. DALY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. DALY. Mr. Speaker, I want to make an inquiry. I have heard of Democratic Congresses and Republican Congresses, but I now want to ask if I am justified in referring to the present Congress as a piscatorial Congress, since we have a "kingfish" at one end of the building and a "poor fish" at the other end? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FISH. I would like to know if the gentleman who just spoke is a Member of Congress. I have never seen him before. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry, but the Chair will answer the inquiry of the gentleman from New York by saying that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is a very prominent and able Member of the House.

Mr. DALY. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will permit, I would say to the gentleman from New York that if he had been present at the sessions of the House attending to his business, as I have been, instead of touring the country maligning the Chief Executive, he would know I am a Member of this House. [Applause.]

OUR BANKING POLICY

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a copy of a request sent to the Congress by the Board of Supervisors of Los Angeles, Calif., and also a letter from Mr. Siegfried, an economist.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, the Banking Act of 1935 has been passed by the House and is now under consideration in the Senate. It was my privilege to participate in the debate on the bill, and in closing my remarks I recommended further study of our banking problem on the part of Congress, and not only on the part of Congress but on the part of commerce, agriculture, and industry. It seems that we have been given to theorizing, and the solution of the problem has not been sought on a factual basis. We must marshal the facts if we expect to treat the subject scientifically. Whether the House or Senate performs this service, now or in the future, it is a duty which remains with the Congress.

Only recently Members received at their offices a document containing suggestions for the act from the well-known economist, Mr. Thorwald Siegfried, of Los Angeles, Calif. Accompanying it was an official request from the Board of Supervisors of Los Angeles for consideration of his proposal which had for its purpose the embodiment of economic equity.

The request of the supervisors, it will be recalled, was as follows:

COUNTY OF LOS ANGELES,
BOARD OF SUPERVISORS,
Los Angeles, Calif.

To the Senate and the House of Representatives in Congress:

The Board of Supervisors of the County of Los Angeles hereby request that due consideration be given the proposal of Mr. Thorwald Siegfried, as presented to the Banking and Currency Committee of the United States Senate and the House of Representatives. Mr. Siegfried's known position as economist and author on economic issues of the day is one that the board of supervisors is familiar with. His position in the community is one of long standing and he is looked upon with high regard.

Very truly yours,

MAME B. BEATTY,
Chief Clerk Board of Supervisors.

From Mr. Siegfried has come to me the following letter under date of May 9, 1935:

MAY 9, 1935.

HON. EDWARD A. KENNEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Complimenting you on having said on May 3 (pp. 7186-7187) the only fundamental things that have appeared in the RECORD up to that time on the subject of banking and currency. All the rest is symptomatic, superficial, emotional, speculative; but the bill of exchange, the self-liquidating item monetized by check, is the core of Anglo-Saxon and American superiority in commerce. When more men wake up to that fact we may have truly scientific banking policy, either by voluntary action of intelligent bankers or by legislation.

If your remarks should be reprinted, I should value having a number of copies for distribution, up to several hundred; also of anything more that you say on this line.

I take this opportunity of handing you another, and marked, copy of the broadside on the currency and banking bill, which was sent to you and other Members last week.

Very sincerely yours,

THORWALD SIEGFRIED.

It is to be hoped, Mr. Speaker, that the Senate now or this House at the earliest opportunity sift the fundamentals relating to banking, whereupon there should be no difficulty in establishing a "truly scientific banking policy."

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the committees.

Mr. McREYNOLDS (when the Committee on Foreign Affairs was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 6504) to amend an act entitled "An act for the grading and classification of clerks in the Foreign Service of the United States of America, and providing compensation therefor", and ask unanimous consent that it may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 11 of the act entitled "An act for the grading and classification of clerks in the Foreign Service of the United States of America and providing compensation therefor", approved February 23, 1931, be, and it is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 11. That all appointments and promotions of Foreign Service officers shall be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and such officers may be commissioned as diplomatic or consular officers or both: Provided, That Foreign Service officers now or hereafter appointed or promoted during a recess of the Senate shall be paid the compensation of the position to which appointed or promoted from the date of such appointment or promotion until the end of the next session of the Senate if they have not theretofore been confirmed by the Senate, or until their rejection by the Senate before the end of its next session: Provided further, That if the Senate should reject or fail to confirm the promotion of a Foreign Service officer during the session following the date of such promotion, the Foreign Service officer shall automatically be reinstated in the position from which he was promoted, such reinstatement to be effective, in the event of rejection of the nomination, from the date of rejection; and in the event of failure of the Senate to act on the nomination during the session following a promotion, from the termination of that session: And provided further, That all official acts of such officers while serving under diplomatic or consular commissions in the Foreign Service shall be performed under their respective commissions as secretaries or as consular officers."

UNITED STATES COURT FOR CHINA

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 7909) to amend the act creating a United States court for China and prescribing the title thereof as amended, and ask unanimous consent that it may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object to ask some questions. What is the necessity for creating these additional employees to send to China? I notice that the bill provides that this clerk to be appointed may act for the judge when the judge is not there. My idea is that the judge ought to be there. There are too many officials who go to foreign countries representing the United States Government and do not stay there and attend to their business. They come back home and stay 2 or 3 months, and some spend their time here lecturing around the country. They have been doing this for 20 years. They want somebody to attend to their business while they are gone.

Mr. Speaker, I doubt the wisdom of passing this bill, although I do not like to put my judgment up against the judgment of the gentleman and his committee. The gentleman, the chairman of this committee, is one of the leading Members of the House. I should like to feel that he watches these things and is not going to approve a bill for extra employees unless it is absolutely necessary.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. May I explain the situation to the gentleman. This is the situation in China. We have one district judge and this judge not only has Shanghai, but he also has to go to two or three other places as far separated as Boston is from San Francisco. All rights of American citizens are determined in this court and it is impossible for the judge to stay in Shanghai all the time. When this situation occurs there is no chance for the settlement of litigation of any kind or for the treatment of prisoners even.

Mr. BLANTON. The thought I have in mind goes back to the passage of the Dyer China Trading Act. When they brought that bill up here for consideration, I called attention to just what would happen; that is, we would have so-called "Americans" going over to China and engaging in business in China for their own commercial advantage. The rest of the people of the United States are not interested at all. These people who go over there are there to make money. I called attention to the fact that this Congress would be called upon year after year to appropriate a lot of money to take care of and protect them and the first thing you know their rights would be invaded over there and we would have to spend a lot of money to protect them. And then over my objections, Mr. Dyer passed another bill to exempt these Americans trading in China from paying an income tax. That law should be repealed.

There is no reason in the world why there should be so many Americans in China doing a private business over there so that the United States Government has to furnish courts in China for them and extra officials to take care of their business.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. May I say to the gentleman from Texas that there are 4,000 American citizens resident in Shanghai. The gentleman must remember that our marines and soldiers are constantly in that territory.

Mr. BLANTON. But their rights are not protected by this court.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Absolutely.

Mr. BLANTON. Their rights are protected by the United States Army and Navy.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. But if they have to be tried they have to go before that court.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman what is the objection to going into Committee of the Whole and considering this matter?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Not in the least.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not care to waste that time. I just want to ask one question. The gentleman stated there are 4,000 Americans doing business in China.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. In Shanghai.

Mr. BLANTON. In China, which includes Shanghai.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Only in Shanghai.

Mr. BLANTON. In what way do they benefit the people of the United States? Our people are not interested in them, or their money-making schemes in China.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts and Mr. TABER demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7909) to amend the act creating a United States court for China and prescribing the title thereof, as amended, with Mr. Houston in the Chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have an understanding as to time.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask a question of the gentleman from Tennessee first?

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I want an understanding as to the division of time.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman will have 1 hour's time at his disposal.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I hope at the outset that the gentleman from Tennessee or the sponsor of the bill will explain it to the House. This may save a good deal of time.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield for a question?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. All I want to know is what benefit it is to the 125,000,000 people of the United States to have these 4,000 people in China doing business for themselves? How does it benefit our nationals here in the United States?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I may say to the gentleman that his question might be pertinent if we were establishing a court at this time, but the court has already been established years ago. Our citizens are over there. They are going there all the time. They are coming away from there. Many of them live there. It is for their protection that the court has been created, and it is for the purpose of giving a speedy trial to those persons involved in litigation.

Mr. BLANTON. I have this thought in mind. I know of men who have gone down into old Mexico to try to get rich by going in the mining business, in the oil business, or in the cattle business. As soon as they got down there they would get into some trouble they ought not to get into, and then call on the Government to spend a lot of money to protect them when probably they should not be protected.

I have found sometimes when they go down there and do wrong they are not entitled to any protection from this Government and this is going on all over the world. We ought to make American citizens stay out of these foreign countries if they are going to expect the Government to be spending money in their behalf all the time.

Mr. BOYLAN. Does that include Mexico, too?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I gladly yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TABER. I notice in the report accompanying this bill there is a letter from the Attorney General.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. TABER. The Attorney General does not seem to warm up to the feature in the bill that the commissioner is to be appointed by the district judge to act as district judge in his absence, and he suggests there be a special or substitute judge appointed by the President. It seems to me that notwithstanding this suggestion and this recommendation of the Attorney General the committee has brought in a bill which does the very thing which the Attorney General objects to, and I would like to have the chairman explain that situation.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman is in error about that. The gentleman is misconstruing the first section of the bill. The first section of the bill amending section 10 merely applies to the consulate court. We have a consulate court there now and he acts in these matters ex officio as judge, and this is merely authority for the judge to appoint his clerk as the consulate court, and not to act for the judge in the other matters referred to. The consulate court is more like a justice-of-the-peace court in this country, with certain limited jurisdictions. The gentleman has misconstrued the language. This bill was drawn in the Attorney General's office, and this letter came in response to another bill which had been introduced. This bill was substituted for the other bill in conformity with the request of the Attorney General, and there was a unanimous report by the committee.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I gladly yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. This bill does not create a new, all-time salaried office, does it?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Not at all.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. It simply provides that the judge may appoint a local attorney to act in his behalf at a per diem of $10 when the judge is necessarily absent from Shanghai on business in other parts of the country.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman is correct. It does not create any additional office. We have a judge in China and under present conditions we have also a consulate court. The consulate court, as I stated a moment ago, is more like a justice-of-the-peace court. When the district judge is not there, there is no one available who can take up these matters, and all the rights of Americans are determined in this district court of the United States. The district judge not only has Shanghai, where there are 4,000 Americans, but he has to go to two other places in China to hold court where we have American citizens and where American rights are involved, and these places are as far apart as Boston from San Francisco. This measure is to apply only in the case of an emergency. If the judge is sick, or if the judge wants to take a vacation of 30 days, he cannot take it. When the change was made over there and the new judge was appointed, there was some lapse of time involved and the people had to go without such a court, and when the former district attorney was before the committee he stated that on account of this condition, at times when the judge is in some other place, American citizens are held in jail for months before they can get a trial.

This does not create a new office. This is simply for the purpose of allowing the President to designate someone in an emergency when the judge cannot be there, who is to receive a paltry sum for his services when the judge is absent. Your committee was unanimous in its report.

Mr. FISH. I would ask the gentleman to spread a little of his wisdom to the Members on this side.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I thought the gentleman, being a member of this committee, was converted and needed no further information.

Mr. FISH. I am with the gentleman, but I want the gentleman to give some information to this side.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I think the Members on that side are all with the committee.

Mr. FISH. No; there is a little opposition here.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Tell me the opposition.

Mr. TABER. I have a suggestion to make to the gentleman, if he will bear with me a moment.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I shall be delighted to do so.

Mr. TABER. This bill says, in line 21, page 2:

Such special judge shall receive the same rate of compensation and the same allowances for expenses and transportation when acting outside of Shanghai as are paid and allowed the judge of said court.

The bill does not say he shall be paid only during the time he is acting during the three instances when he is permitted to have such jurisdiction. It seems to me this language could be clarified quite considerably with reference to the compensation of the judge and show that he should only receive the compensation when he is actually serving under the conditions set out in the three lettered subdivisions of the bill.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I am thoroughly in accord with the gentleman, and if he will draft such an amendment I shall be pleased to support it.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I think the purpose can be accomplished by changing the position of a comma, moving the comma after the word "compensation", in line 22, to line 23, after the word "transportation", making it read:

Such special judge shall receive the same rate of compensation and the same allowances for expenses and transportation, when acting outside of Shanghai, as are paid and allowed the judge of said court.

Mr. TABER. I am afraid it would not.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The Chairman agrees with you, and if you can arrange an amendment I am willing to accept it.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. The suggestion of the gentleman from New York can be accomplished by transposing the words "when acting outside of Shanghai" to the beginning of the paragraph, making it read:

When acting outside of Shanghai such special judge shall receive the same rate of compensation—

And so forth.

Mr. TABER. I think that would accomplish it.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Is it not true that while the judge has jurisdiction over 4,000 people, in reality he will have jurisdiction most of the time over 8,000 because there are a great many sailors and marines placed there?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. That is true. I want to say to the House that the committee does feel that this is a measure of relief that should be granted.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Gladly.

Mr. FISH. Did not the committee a few years ago take up the question of abolishing extraterritorial rights and privileges in China?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. That has been done with reference to other courts. There was a consular court at Shanghai composed of the consuls of our Government and other governments and also China. That court which had jurisdiction in China is now strictly a Chinese court.

Mr. FISH. Has the committee considered the question whether we should have extraterritorial rights in China?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. No; it has not been reached.

Mr. FISH. Does the gentleman think we should continue it?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. At this time I am not prepared to say.

Mr. FISH. Then why should we pass this bill?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Because we have this situation.

Mr. FISH. Would the gentleman be in favor of legislation to abrogate them?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no further demand for time, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act creating a United States Court for China and prescribing the title thereof", approved June 30, 1906 (34 Stat. 814), as amended, be, and it is hereby, amended by the addition of the following sections:

"Sec. 10. That the judge of the United States Court for China is hereby authorized to appoint, as in the District Courts of the United States and with similar powers and tenure of office, a United States commissioner, who shall in addition to his other duties be judge of the consular court for the district of Shanghai, with all the authority and jurisdiction exercised prior to June 4, 1920, by the vice consul at Shanghai. Said commissioner shall receive for his services as commissioner and judge of said consular court such compensation as may be fixed by the Attorney General, not exceeding $10 per day for each day of service actually rendered. In the event of a vacancy in the office of said commissioner or the disability or disqualification or absence of said commissioner, the judge of the United States Court for China may appoint the clerk of said court temporarily to perform the duties of commissioner and judge of the consular court for the district of Shanghai without additional compensation therefor.

"Sec. 11. The President may appoint a special judge of the United States Court for China to act temporarily when necessary—

"(a) During the absence of the judge of said court;

"(b) During any period of disability or disqualification, from sickness or otherwise, to discharge his duties; or

"(c) In the event of a vacancy in the office of judge.

"Such special judge shall receive the same rate of compensation, and the same allowances for expenses and transportation when acting outside of Shanghai, as are paid and allowed the judge of said court."

SEC. 2. All laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 24, after the word "court" insert "No compensation shall be paid to said judge except in the actual discharge of his duties provided by this section."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to. Accordingly, the Committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Houston, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 7909, to amend the act creating a United States Court for China and prescribing the title thereof, as amended, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I be granted until midnight tonight to file a report and minority views on the bill (H. R. 8052) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF MILITARY MEDICINE AND PHARMACY

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Joint Resolution 249, to provide for participation by the United States in the Eighth International Congress of Military Medicine and Pharmacy, to be held at Brussels, Belgium, in June 1935, and ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee calls up House Joint Resolution 249, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $8,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the expenses of participation by the United States in the Eighth International Congress of Military Medicine and Pharmacy to be held at Brussels, Belgium, in 1935, including personal services in the District of Columbia or elsewhere without reference to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended; stenographic reporting and other services by contract if deemed necessary without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5); rent; traveling expenses; purchase of necessary books, documents, newspapers, periodicals, and maps; stationery, official cards; printing and binding; entertainment; and such other expenses as may be authorized by the Secretary of State, including the reimbursement of other appropriations from which payments may have been made for any of the purposes herein specified.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House joint resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word, to ask some questions of the chairman of the committee. Is not this a junketing bill?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I do not think so.

Mr. BLANTON. Is not the purpose of this to spend $8,000 on a junket to Brussels for certain medical men in one branch of our Government?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Does the gentleman want me to answer that?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Perhaps the gentleman should have waited for the chairman to explain the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I just want an answer yes or no.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. No; it is not.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am afraid, nevertheless, that it is, after all, a junketing resolution without my friend knowing it, and I am afraid there are some more junkets in some other bills on today's calendar.

Incidentally, it is well known to my colleagues here that I have never been on a junket since I have been in Congress. I have paid my own expenses out of my own pocket every time I have been to a funeral, and every time I have checked up Government projects in different parts of the United States, and not one dollar has the Government ever reimbursed me for it.

Yet in the Washington Times yesterday appeared the following malicious statement:

When the House committee was named to attend the funeral of the late Senator Bronson Cutting, of New Mexico, Representative THOMAS L. BLANTON was selected as a member of the group.

When the committee was first named, it was thought that the services would be held in New Mexico.

Had that been true, BLANTON would have had the opportunity to stop off at Abilene, Tex., his home. And his trip would have been paid for by the taxpayers of the Nation whom he always contends he wants to protect.

When it was announced, however, that services would be held in New York instead of in New Mexico, BLANTON made a long speech asking to be replaced on the committee.

He suggested the appointment of Representative MATTHEW J. MERRITT, of New York.

BLANTON apparently was not interested in a New York trip.

Those of you colleagues who were not then present should look at the RECORD and see the brief request in just a few words I made asking the Speaker to appoint in my place our distinguished colleague, Hon. MATTHEW J. MERRITT, who is Congressman at large from the entire State of New York.

As this funeral was to take place in New York, I felt that honor could be done our deceased friend, the late able and distinguished Senator from New Mexico, by having a Representative of the whole State of New York to attend this funeral.

Yet, even on such a subject, Hearst's Washington Times could not forget its spleen and malice against me long enough not to refrain from misrepresenting the facts, and misleading the public about the real facts.

Since I have been a member of the subcommittee which handles and frames the War Department appropriation bill, I have been one of the official visitors to the United States Military Academy, at West Point, and could have had the Government pay all of my expenses to West Point, N. Y., and back every year, yet not one dollar have I had the Government pay out for such purpose. I could have had the Government pay my expenses on a trip to Panama each year to inspect Government property there, for which my committee appropriates, yet not one dollar has this Government ever paid out for me on any trip to Panama. I could have had the Government pay my expenses whenever I have inspected Government property and projects owned by our Military Establishment, yet not one dollar has the Government ever paid out for same.

I have inspected Government property and Government projects in many parts of the United States, but invariably

I have always paid all of the expenses of same out of my own pocket.

Not one junket have I ever taken. Not a single trip have I ever taken at Government expense. I have always paid for my own trips.

Last year I spent quite a large sum of money out of my own pocket checking up Government projects, so that I would have first-hand information about them when our committee is called upon to make large appropriations for same. I could have been reimbursed for all of it by merely filing expense accounts, for there was money already appropriated to cover just such expenses, yet I filed no expense accounts, and did not ask for reimbursement, but paid all of such expenses myself.

And it is an infamous outrage on the part of this Hearst newspaper continually to make these malicious misrepresentations. It is hurting Hearst and not me, for his readers are gradually learning that they cannot depend on anything they see in one of his newspapers.

But, getting back to this measure, has my friend from Tennessee investigated the necessity for spending $8,000 to have someone attend this medical conference in Brussels?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The committee investigated it very thoroughly.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman think it absolutely necessary?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I think it would be very beneficial. Everyone in this House knows the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], Mr. Speaker, and who knows his record knows that the gentleman is against junkets. The chairman of this committee is against them; but there are certain things in which we feel the Government ought to engage that are very beneficial.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have such confidence in the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS], who is the chairman of this committee, and who is close to the Speaker—and I know that the Speaker is not going to permit any junkets if he can help it—that I shall not stand in the way of his bill or delay it any further, although I have not been fully convinced that we could not save this $8,000 and keep it from going out of the Treasury without injury to our interests.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 11, insert the following new section:
"SEC. 2. The funds made available under this authorization shall be expended under the supervision of the Secretary of State."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR ESTABLISHMENTS AT HELSINGFORS, FINLAND

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 4448, to provide funds for acquisition of a site, erection of buildings, and the furnishing thereof for the use of the diplomatic and consular establishments of the United States at Helsingfors, Finland, and I ask unanimous consent that the same be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of further carrying into effect the provisions of the Foreign Service Buildings Act of 1926, as amended, there is authorized to be appropriated, in addition to the amount authorized by such act, an amount not to exceed $300,000 for the purpose of acquiring a site, erection of buildings, and the furnishings thereof, for the use of the diplomatic and consular establishments of the United States at Helsingfors, Finland. Sums appropriated pursuant to this act shall be available for the purpose and be subject to the conditions and limitations of the Foreign Service Buildings Act of 1926, as amended.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, if this were not for Finland, I would not be for it. Finland, geographically and financially, is one of the smallest nations, and yet it is the only nation that has had the honesty to pay back to the United States Government its obligations for borrowed money.

I take off my hat to little Finland. It is honest. It is reliable. It is dependable. It is grateful. It has appreciation. It is not an ingrate.

I used to be proud of the fact that my forbears came from England to this country and settled in Virginia. I used to be proud of it; but I am not proud of it any longer. After all this country did for Great Britain in the World War, when she had her back to the wall and France was on her knees, when Italy and Russia had been whipped out of the picture, this country came to their rescue and sent billions of dollars over there, money that was raised at great sacrifice by the American people. We put 4,000,000 men in uniform and sent our men and flag across the waters and saved their civilization. It is an infamous outrage that a great nation like Great Britain and France should disregard their obligations to this country. I have no patience with any ingrate. Talk about balanced budgets! There will be none in England or France until they make proper provision to pay the sacred debts of honor they owe us.

Little Finland, great honor to her! The first foreign country that I visit is going to be Finland. Here is to the health, happiness, and prosperity to Finland. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is a very proper gesture to a friendly nation, Finland, the only nation that has paid its war debts. I do not know that I can agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] in singling out Great Britain for not paying its share of the war debt. I think it is only fair to tell the House that Great Britain has paid a far larger degree of its debt to the United States than any other foreign country except Finland. The money Great Britain paid back was for credit extended or money loaned during the World War. What I object to is the fact that there are a number of nations, and perhaps it is not wise to name them all, that have not even paid back the money that we loaned them after the war was won or after the armistice was signed. That was not the case with Great Britain. I did not take the floor to defend Great Britain or any other nation for not paying the war debts, on the very liberal adjustment made with them by the Congress and the Government of the United States, especially in view of the huge sums they are spending on military and naval armaments.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman knows that if England and France had not defaulted, and had not deliberately refused to provide means to pay the interest on these debts, other countries would have followed suit. When they did default, the other countries followed what they did, and also defaulted. So, after all, that is the reason I blame those two great countries for leading in defaulting.

Mr. FISH. I blame them both, but particularly I blame France for not paying the money we loaned them after the armistice. Now, the joker of the whole situation is this: We have been paid approximately $2,000,000,000 by our former allies on these debts, most of it by Great Britain, which has paid about $1,400,000,000. Germany has paid to the Allies approximately $2,000,000,000 in the way of reparations and indemnities, but the American people have loaned German cities and industrial companies about $2,500,000,000. So that today Germany is in $500,000,000, over and above her payment of war reparations and indemnities.

But I did not rise to speak on that issue. I just wanted to join the committee and say that this is a very proper step to take and a worthy tribute of our esteem and friendship for Finland. Finland is one of the poorest nations of the world, but one of the most honorable. Their Members of Congress or the Diet receive less than $1,000 a year, and their members of Cabinet get approximately $2,500, and I think their President is paid a salary of $14,000. Finland is the only nation which has actually paid in full in accordance with the terms of the debt settlement with the United States. That speaks well for the Finnish people, both in Finland and in the United States. There are no more loyal, industrious, honest, or dependable people in our country than those from Finland. This bill should be passed by a unanimous vote, not only as a tribute to Finland, the one nation that has paid her debts to us, but to the people of Finnish origin in the United States in order to show our appreciation of their native land—honest little Finland.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I hope that this bill will be passed by a unanimous vote by the House and in the Senate without any further delay and be enacted into law, and $300,000 be made immediately available for the purpose of acquiring a site, erection of buildings, and the furnishings thereof for the use of the diplomatic and consular establishments of the United States at Helsingfors, Finland.

Let me ask this, as long as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS], Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, is on his feet, what has happened to the $1,200,000 we appropriated for an embassy in Soviet Russia, which has refused to pay its debts? Can the gentleman enlighten this House on that? What a marked difference there is between Finland, formerly a part of Russia, and the present Soviet Government of Russia.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman from New York is a member of that building commission, and he has the same information as the chairman of the committee.

Mr. FISH. I am inclined to believe that in view of the repudiation of its promises made when we recognized Soviet Russia that no American embassy will be built or ought to be built in Moscow until an agreement is reached to pay or reimburse American citizens for property seized by the Soviet Government.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] has expired.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Speaker, it is a source of a great deal of pleasure to me that we have this bill before us for consideration, and I feel that the House is for it unanimously. I take some little pride in having originated the idea of providing for the erection of a building in Finland to house our diplomatic and consular activities in that country. I feel that it is a gesture in the right direction to that Nation, small though it be, which has shown loyalty to principle by paying its obligations to this Government. Not only is it a mark of respect we desire to show them but also it is thoroughly justifiable from the facts existing in Helsingfors. The other great nations of the world excepting the United States have creditable buildings in Helsingfors. Our forces, including our Minister, occupy the fifth floor of a store building. We pay nearly $12,000 per year in rentals. While the pending bill calls for an authorization of $300,000, our Minister to Finland states that he feels it will cost only $275,000 for the purchase of the property and the construction of suitable buildings which will be a credit to this Government. So, figured in this way, and considering that it will cost the Government only 2½ or 3 percent to procure this money, we shall have an ultimate saving in our rentals in Helsingfors and at the same time will be showing some honor and respect to that little nation which stands by its own obligations. I am sure every Member of the House will be glad to vote for this bill. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendments were withdrawn.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PAN AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF GEOGRAPHY AND HISTORY

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Joint Resolution 182, to provide for membership of the United States in the Pan American Institute of Geography and History; and to authorize the President to extend an invitation for the next general assembly of the institute to meet in the United States in 1935, and to provide an appropriation for expenses thereof, and ask unanimous consent that the House joint resolution may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That to enable the United States to become a member of the Pan American Institute of Geography and History there is hereby authorized to be appropriated annually the sum of $10,000 for the payment of the quota of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to extend to the Pan American Institute of Geography and History an invitation to hold the second general assembly of the Institute in the United States in the year 1935;

SEC. 3. That the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the expenses of such a meeting, including personal services without reference to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; stenographic reporting and other services by contract if deemed necessary, without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 4, sec. 5); rent, traveling expenses; purchase of necessary books and documents; newspapers and periodicals; stationery; official cards; printing and binding; entertainment; hire, maintenance, and operation of motor-propelled passenger vehicles; and such other expenses as may be actually and necessarily incurred by the Government of the United States by reason of such invitation in the observance of proper courtesies, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State.

Mr. CASTELLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation now under consideration, House Joint Resolution 182, has two objectives. First, it provides for membership of the United States in the Pan American Institute of Geography and History. Second, it authorizes the President to extend an invitation to the Institute to hold its next regular session in Washington, D. C. The bill also authorizes an annual appropriation of $10,000 to pay the pro rata share of the United States of the expenses of the Institute, and provides further for an appropriation of $10,000 to defray the expenses incident to the meeting of the Institute here next fall.

For the benefit of the House I will undertake to give a brief history of the Pan American Institute of Geography and History. It was created by a resolution of the Sixth International Conference of American States in Habana, Cuba, on February 7, 1928. Article 8 of the resolution provides:

The seat of the institute shall be the capital of any American state chosen by the Pan American Union. The Government of the American state which accepts the locating of the institute in its capital shall provide a building appropriate for the labors hereinbefore enunciated which it must perform.

The governing board of the Pan American Union, after mature consideration, designated Mexico City as the seat of the institute. The Mexican Government having accepted the location has provided at its own expense a suitable and commodious building for its accommodation. On September 16, 1929, representatives from 19 American nations met in the national palace in the city of Mexico for the purpose of organization. The United States was represented at the meeting by Col. Lawrence Martin, Chief Division of Maps, Library of Congress; Prof. George B. Winton, professor of history, Vanderbilt University; and Dr. William Bowie, Chief Division of Geodesy, United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, all having been appointed as delegates by the President.

The budget, accepted at this preliminary assembly, contemplated an annual expenditure of $52,000 with the part to be borne by the United States fixed at $31,750. At the first regular assembly of the institute, held in Rio de Janeiro in 1932, the total annual budget was reduced to $27,900, and the part to be borne by the United States was reduced to $10,000.

At the meeting in Rio de Janeiro the United States was represented by Hon. Edwin V. Morgan, Ambassador to Brazil, and Dr. Wallace W. Atwood, president of Clark University, Worcester, Mass. The assembly selected Dr. Atwood as executive president for the succeeding 3 years and Washington as the next place of meeting.

In a communication from Hon. Wilbur J. Carr, Assistant Secretary of State, to Hon. KEY PITTMAN, Chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, on June 7, 1934, the objectives of the institute were enumerated as follows:

The purpose of the institute should be to serve for the coordination, distribution, and publication of geographical and historical studies in the American States and to serve as an organ of cooperation between the geographical and historical institutes of America in order to facilitate the study of the publications which concern geography and history and to initiate and coordinate investigations which require the cooperation of several countries and to direct scientific discussion.

Topographic and geodetic maps, prepared under the supervision of this institute may be most helpful to the various American countries in the development of their natural resources. The data prepared by such agency might also be found most advantageous in promoting transportation facilities, including railroads, motor vehicles, and airplanes. [Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia is a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee. It was the intention of the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS], that the gentleman from Georgia should have 30 minutes in the Committee of the Whole to make his speech; and I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia may have an additional 25 minutes in which to finish his speech, which is the time he would have had in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. CASTELLOW. Mr. Speaker, the institute is essentially of a nonpartisan nature, but its services might become available where matters of dispute over border lines and kindred questions arise between American nations in the event that each government concerned might make specific request for such services upon the part of the agency.

In referring to the pending bill, Dr. Wallace W. Atwood, president of the institute, had the following to say:

As I mingle with the Latin-American people I realize more strongly each year that we must establish cordial cultural relations with them. They appreciate those finer things in life and they are much interested in coming to know us in other than commercial ways.

Our Washington meeting should do much to help strengthen the spirit of cordial good will and respect. In the end I believe it will aid greatly in promoting commercial relations.

In addition to the recommendation of Secretary Hull to our Foreign Affairs Committee of the House regarding the bill, I have a personal message from him, in part as follows:

From a scientific and educational point of view the aims of the institute are very commendable and the active participation of this Government will greatly enhance the effectiveness of the institute's work. I believe that this Pan American organ would ultimately prove of great value to many branches of the Government, scientific organizations, and educational institutions in the United States. * * * In my opinion the Pan American Institute of Geography and History is a worthy endeavor and I am convinced that its support by the United States would be received with great satisfaction by the other American nations.

A message from the President to the Congress, under date of February 20, 1935, is as follows:

I commend to the favorable consideration of the Congress the enclosed report from the Secretary of State, with an accompanying paper, to the end that legislation may be enacted providing for an annual appropriation of $10,000 for the payment of the share of this Government in the expenses of the Pan American Institute of Geography and History and requesting the President to invite the Pan American Institute of Geography and History to hold its second general assembly in the United States in 1935, and providing an appropriation of $10,000 for the expenses of such a meeting.

If by joining our efforts with those of our sister Republics to the south we can promote a closer relationship and a more thorough accord in the solution of our mutual problems, the civic, social, and commercial splendor of a new era for this hemisphere is assured. So in response to the expressed wishes of all our scientific organizations, and upon the request of the Secretary of State and our President, let us now pass, without further delay, this worth-while legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION AT BRUSSELS, BELGIUM, 1935

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Joint Resolution 210 for the participation of the United States in a universal and international exhibition at Brussels, Belgium, in 1935.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up House Joint Resolution 210 of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read the title of the House joint resolution.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 73]

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and thirty-six Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

HOME MORTGAGE RELIEF

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have until midnight to file a conference report on the bill (H. R. 6021) to provide additional home-mortgage relief, to amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, and the National Housing Act, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION AT BRUSSELS, BELGIUM, 1935

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 210), for the participation of the United States in a universal and international exhibition at Brussels, Belgium, in 1935, with Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the joint resolution be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, there are some Members on this side of the aisle who want the joint resolution read; therefore I must object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the invitation extended by the Belgian Government to the United States to participate in a universal and international exhibition to be held at Brussels, Belgium, in 1935 is hereby accepted.

Sec. 2. The President is authorized to appoint a commissioner general to represent the United States in the exhibition. The commissioner general shall prescribe the duties of the commissioner and shall, under the direction of the Secretary of State, (1) make all needful rules and regulations relative to the exhibits from this country and its overseas territories, and for the expenditures incident to the installation of such exhibits, and for the preparation of reports of the exposition and the general results thereof; (2) furnish such information to private exhibitors and prospective exhibitors as he may deem requisite and feasible; (3) make all proper arrangements for the preparation, transportation, installation, display, and care of the exhibits from this country and its overseas territories; (4) with reference to such exhibits from this country and its overseas territories, and reports, cooperate with and secure the assistance of the various executive departments and branches of the Government participating in the exposition, which departments and branches may, with the approval of the Secretary of State, designate officials or employees of their departments or branches to assist the commissioner general, but no such official or employee so designated shall receive a salary in excess of the amount which he has been receiving in the department or branch where employed, plus such reasonable additional allowance for expenses as may be deemed proper by the Secretary of State; (5) employ such clerks, stenographers, and other assistants as may be necessary, and fix their reasonable compensation; and (6) purchase such material, contract for such labor and services, and cause to be constructed such buildings as may be necessary to carry out the general purpose of this act. The heads of the various departments and branches of the Government are authorized, in cooperation with the Secretary of State, to collect and prepare suitable exhibits for display at the exposition, accompanied by appropriate descriptions in the French, Flemish, and English languages.

Sec. 3. Officers and employees of the executive departments or branches of the Government in charge of or responsible for the safekeeping of any property of this country and its overseas territories which is proposed to be exhibited, may permit such property, on the request of the commissioner general, to pass from their possession for the purpose of being transported to and from and exhibited at the exposition. At the close of the exhibition, or when the connection of the Government of the United States therewith ceases, if practicable, the commissioner general shall cause all such property to be returned to the respective departments and branches from which taken; and if the return of any such property is not practicable, he may, with the knowledge of the department or branch from which it was taken, and with the approval of the Secretary of State, make such disposition thereof as he may deem advisable and account therefor.

Sec. 4. In order to defray the expenses hereinbefore specified and all the singular expenses necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to remain available until expended. All expenditures shall be subject to approval by the Secretary of State and payable upon his certification, but shall not be subject to the provisions of any law other than this act regulating or limiting the expenditure of public money, but this provision shall not be construed to waive the submission of accounts and vouchers to the General Accounting Office for audit or permit any indebtedness to be incurred in excess of the amount authorized to be appropriated.

Sec. 5. The commissioner general, with the approval of the Secretary of State, may receive from any source contributions to aid in carrying out the general purpose of this act, but the same shall be expended and accounted for in the same manner as any appropriation which may be made under authority of this act. The commissioner general is also authorized to receive contributions of material to aid in carrying out the general purpose of this act, and at the close of the exposition or when the connection of the Government of the United States therewith ceases, under the direction of the Secretary of State, shall dispose of any such portion thereof as may be unused.

Sec. 6. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to transmit to Congress within 6 months after the close of the exposition a detailed statement of all expenditures, together with the reports hereinbefore specified and such other reports as he may deem proper which reports shall be prepared and arranged with a view to concise statement and convenient reference.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, of all the bills introduced in the Congress of the United States on expositions, I think this bill is unique. In the first place, it does not authorize an appropriation for any junket. I heard someone a few moments ago say that this is only a junket bill involving $25,000. If the Members will read the bill they will find there are no salaries paid to any commission, which is rather unusual. It merely provides for the United States to participate in the exposition to be held in Belgium.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. I wonder if the gentleman will read paragraph 5, line 21, of page 2 for the benefit of the Members of the House?

Mr. BLOOM (reading):

(5) Employ such clerks, stenographers, and other assistants as may be necessary.

Now, what is the question?

Mr. TABER. I thought the Committee might be interested in knowing that the money could be used to employ such clerks, stenographers, and other assistants that may be necessary, and their reasonable compensation may be fixed.

Mr. BLOOM. Yes; the gentleman is correct; but it is not a junket for the reason that only applies to the different departments who may send clerks over. There is a commissioner general provided for, who will be our Ambassador to Belgium, Mr. Morris. He is to act as the commissioner general, and the Ambassador has graciously offered to contribute the time necessary to make our part of it a success.

Mr. Chairman, the only reason these expositions are held is for the benefit of trade. That is why we participate and that is why we hold expositions.

Now, let us see what has happened to our export business to Belgium. In 1929 our exports were $114,855,000. In 1930 they dwindled to $86,000,000 and in 1931 they went down to $59,441,000. In 1932 the exports were $40,278,000. In 1933 they were $43,268,000 and in 1934, $49,814,000. The balance of trade in favor of the United States has gone from $40,807,000 to $23,640,000.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Has the gentleman any figures indicating what the balance of trade was before the war?

Mr. BLOOM. I have not those figures before me at this time.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I was wondering to what extent the favorable balance during the latter part of the decade of 1920 was due to the loans that were extended to European countries, and whether the dropping off in part represents only the cessation of credit?

Mr. BLOOM. Unfortunately, I have not the information before me, and I do not want to say anything or give any answer unless I am sure of my figures. I may say, however, that one of the principal reasons our export trade has dwindled down is because we keep on insulting the different peoples of the world. On the floor of this House there is always an exception to participating in friendly expositions, and you cannot expect to hold your world trade or increase your trade unless you are friendly and honest in your expressions of thought. That is a fact.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I want to assure the gentleman that was not my intention in asking the gentleman the question I did; however, I would like to know if somebody can give the information as to what part of this trade with foreign countries, especially with Belgium, during the latter part of the twenties was due to the credit that we extended to them and such artificial devices as that?

Mr. BLOOM. I may say to the gentleman that I might have this information in my office. I did not think that question was going to be brought up here today. I will be very glad to insert the information in the RECORD.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. Did I understand the gentleman to say that our export trade had dwindled to nearly nothing?

Mr. BLOOM. I did not say that.

Mr. SNELL. Did I understand the gentleman to say that a few minutes ago?

Mr. BLOOM. Our exports in general have gone down.

Mr. SNELL. Did the gentleman say they had dwindled to nearly nothing?

Mr. BLOOM. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Will you give that information to my good friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], because yesterday I made a statement not nearly as broad as that and he disputed me. If you will give the gentleman that information to put in his speech it will make a much better speech.

Mr. BLOOM. I would like to give the gentleman some information. Is the gentleman willing to receive some information along this line?

Mr. SNELL. Surely.

Mr. BLOOM. If our export trade, which was $114,855,000 in 1929, dwindled to $43,000,000, I would like to have the gentleman give the reason for it.

Mr. SNELL. I will give the gentleman some of the reasons if he will give me the time.

Mr. BLOOM. I will give the gentleman time, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. SNELL. I spent about an hour day before yesterday giving some of the reasons our export trade had gone all to pieces, and my friend O'CONNOR said my statements were not correct, but the gentleman has now fortified me in the statements I then made.

Mr. BLOOM. I can assure the gentleman that the argument of the gentleman should go to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], and not to me. This is a different kind of argument.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman was speaking about trade balances?

Mr. BLOOM. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I wonder if the gentleman has seen the report of Mr. Peek, and if so, how he reconciles his statement with that report.

Mr. BLOOM. I will say to the gentleman I am going to stick to this Brussels exposition, and we are not going to get into an argument here that will take up the entire hour. I have enough trouble right here now, I admit. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. BLOOM. I yield.

Mr. LEHLBACH. While the gentleman is giving us foreign-trade figures as between the United States and Belgium, will he not give us the figures showing how much our exports to Belgium have increased as a result of the trade agreement recently entered into?

Mr. BLOOM. With respect to the question the gentleman has just asked, in the first place, sufficient time has not elapsed to really give any figures or to find out how beneficial it will be, but to give you an idea of the friendly feeling between the two countries, and I am only speaking of Belgium now, this is an order of May 13, 1935, which is pretty close.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The gentleman is going to refer to lard.

Mr. BLOOM. How well the gentleman anticipates. I am going to refer to lard, and the gentleman already knows about it. Do not conceal the good things entirely, but bring them out; and for the benefit of the entire committee I would like to illustrate the friendly feeling between Belgium and the United States.

This is dated May 13, 1935:

The Belgian Ambassador informed the State Department today that his Government had decided to reduce the import license tax on lard from 100 francs per hundred kilos to 50 francs per 100 kilos. This action was voluntary on the part of the Belgian Government, for which no return concession was demanded.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. I will yield in just a moment.

By the terms of the trade agreement between the United States and Belgium, which becomes effective on May 1, Belgium had already granted a generous quota on American lard. This proposed 50-percent reduction in the import license tax will be of benefit to hog producers, since the United States exports of lard to Belgium were 15,617,835 pounds in 1933. The reduction will bring the import charges into Belgium on United States lard down to approximately three-fourths of a cent per pound.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is simply a business proposition. Belgium, at the lowest ebb of exports, bought from us $43,268,000 worth of goods in 1 year. In 1929 it was $114,855,000, and this order was entered just a few days ago and shows the friendly feeling between Belgium and the United States.

You are now asked to authorize an appropriation of $25,000 just to show that the United States wants to participate and join with Belgium and be represented at the exposition there this year.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. I shall be pleased to yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. KENNEY. Will the Commissioner General report to the Congress on our participation in this exposition?

Mr. BLOOM. Yes.

Let me explain to you just what this means. When this bill first came up we were economizing in every way, and we knew we could not get an appropriation of $250,000 or $300,000, which is the sum usually appropriated for such purposes. Just the other day we appropriated $350,000 for the exposition in San Diego, which was a small sum for such an exposition. It should have been more.

We should be represented in Belgium and this bill only provides for the representative of our Government over there, so that he may participate in the various meetings that take place in connection with the representatives from the different countries of the world. This is all that it amounts to and it is not a junket. Even if we spent the entire $25,000, which I do not think we can the way we are going to participate, we would not be spending very much.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. This is May 15, 1935. The Senate of the United States has passed on only a very few of the supply bills, and on only a few of the other major bills. It has all that legislation before it to pass upon and the exposition is now almost over in Belgium.

Mr. BLOOM. No.

Mr. BLANTON. It is almost over, and does not the gentleman from New York know that before you could get this kind of bill through the Senate and passed there, by setting aside all the major legislation we are trying to get through over there, the summer would be over.

Mr. BLOOM. No; this appropriation will be in the next deficiency bill if this House passes it. There is nothing to the whole matter except $25,000.

Mr. BLANTON. The sum of $25,000 should not be wasted, and is worth saving. The House Appropriations Committee has passed every one of the supply bills.

Mr. BLOOM. But you have a deficiency bill pending now.

Mr. BLANTON. That is the last one to come up before our adjournment sine die.

Mr. BLOOM. That is time enough.

Mr. BLANTON. That will be about the first of July.

Mr. BLOOM. If you will pass this appropriation—give it to the Government—

Mr. BLANTON. If they give it to the gentleman he will find some way of spending it I know.

Mr. BLOOM. That is all right, but you just authorize it under this bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. How much did Belgium give or appropriate for the exposition at Chicago?

Mr. BLOOM. I do not know, but I will say that that was one of the finest exhibitions at the Chicago exposition. We are asking other countries to participate in our expositions. We have two bills here asking them to participate in expositions, one of them in Texas next year. You cannot expect people to come over here and participate in our expositions, spend more money than we spend, it would not be right to ask them to come here all the time and we not participate in their expositions.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The Texas centennial that comes off next year is not for the benefit of foreign nations. It is for the benefit of American citizens. It is the one State in this Union that has been a republic of itself. It has had its own flag.

Mr. BLOOM. Six flags.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; under six flags. It has been of tremendous benefit to the United States, not only to the great State of Texas but to the whole country, by causing the acquisition of much valuable territory to the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The gentleman from New York is a good judge of these matters, and looking at it not from a political standpoint but from sound economic principles, does not the gentleman think that this investment of $25,000 to participate in the Belgium exposition will be profitable to this country?

Mr. BLOOM. There is no question about it; but I do not look at it from that standpoint, for this reason: We should do something, and we do not want it to appear as if $25,000 was for real participation. If we participated in that exposition the way they participated in our exposition at Chicago, it would cost 10 times as much. But, as I said at the beginning, our Ambassador in Belgium has graciously consented to see that our representation abroad will be such that we will not be ashamed of it. It is necessary for us to delegate someone over there as commissioner general to represent the United States. That is why this resolution is brought on the floor today.

Mr. LUCKEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. I yield.

Mr. LUCKEY. Was not the Belgium exhibition in Chicago financed by private concerns?

Mr. BLOOM. Yes. I am glad the gentleman asked that question; that is what this bill provides for.

Mr. LUCKEY. You authorize an appropriation of $25,000.

Mr. BLOOM. We have to have something to start in on and we could not make it any less.

Mr. LUCKEY. I think that this is another one of those junkets.

Mr. BLOOM. You cannot have much of a junket on $25,000 for participation in an exposition.

Mr. FIESINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. Certainly.

Mr. FIESINGER. How are you going to house this thing over there?

Mr. BLOOM. Whatever we have there we have to pay out of this $25,000. We are permitted to take donations.

Mr. FIESINGER. You will have to have some kind of housing?

Mr. BLOOM. No, not necessarily; they will furnish us space.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Here are the facts. This invitation was extended to the United States by Belgium in 1927.

Mr. BLOOM. Right.

Mr. BLANTON. That was 8 years ago.

Mr. BLOOM. That is right.

Mr. BLANTON. And the Cabinet discussed it at a meeting in 1933, 2 years ago.

Mr. BLOOM. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And turned it down, did they not?

Mr. BLOOM. Not exactly turned it down. They did not approve of it.

Mr. BLANTON. They disapproved of it.

Mr. BLOOM. For what reason?

Mr. BLANTON. Disapproval is turning it down, is it not?

Mr. BLOOM. Oh, no.

Mr. BLANTON. I would say so. I think disapproving it means turning it down.

Mr. BLOOM. As Al Smith would say, "Let us look at the record."

Mr. BLANTON. I compliment my distinguished friend from New York upon his pertinacity.

Mr. BLOOM. Oh, no; not that. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. For not taking "no" from the Department, because he has gone back to them again and again, and finally has gotten them to agree not to disapprove it.

Mr. BLOOM. Let us look at this. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] says so many nice things about me that I think that last word, pertinacity, is something terrible. [Laughter.]

Mr. TABER. I wonder if the Department really did approve it.

Mr. BLOOM. Do you want me to read it to you?

Mr. TABER. Yes; if it did.

Mr. BLOOM. I did not say approve and I did not say they did not turn it down, but just let me read this to you, and this is from Secretary Hull:

I wish to reiterate, however, that considering the matter from the standpoint of the friendly relations existing between Belgium and the United States, there will be no objection to the passage of this resolution.

Mr. TABER rose.

Mr. BLOOM. Please wait a minute. This is one time that I do not want to yield. I leave it to the committee whether that is complete disapproval of this resolution. It is not. The gentleman from Texas spoke about this coming up in 1927. We have today two resolutions that invite the nations of the world to participate in the San Francisco exposition and in the San Diego exposition, I think in 1938. I do not know whether the resolutions have passed regarding the holding of an exposition in 1938. From 1927 to 1933 of course nothing was done. It did not come before any of the committees. They just had this invitation, and let it stay there. In 1933 they brought it up and said they could not appropriate any money at that time, because they did not have the money or did not want to spend it for that purpose, but Secretary Roper thought that he could raise the money from the outside. So we say that with this $25,000 we can participate, and I sincerely hope the committee will act favorably on this resolution.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLOOM. Yes.

Mr. TABER. I wonder if the gentleman could tell us when this exposition opens.

Mr. BLOOM. It has not opened yet.

Mr. TABER. When does it open?

Mr. BLOOM. I think I could tell you in a moment.

Mr. MICHENER. The lady here says that it opened last February and is just about through. Is that correct?

Mr. BLOOM. Oh, no. Perhaps on the Republican side that is so, but we still go by the calendar on this side. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, let us get the facts straightened out first.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Has the gentleman any idea who is going to be the Commissioner General under this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not know of a man whom I would prefer more than my good friend from New York [Mr. Bloom]. [Applause.]

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I agree with the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. He made such a valuable commissioner for the George Washington Centennial that I do not believe you could get a better one anywhere.

Here are the facts. I have here a copy of a letter from the Department. I want my colleagues to remember that foreign countries deal with our country through our State Department. Our State Department handles all business for this Government with foreign governments and when our Government wants to participate in some exposition abroad, the request comes from the State Department to the Congress asking us to let them make an exhibit, and asking us for the money. No such request has come from the Department. The request comes from our good friend from New York, Sol Bloom. That is the reason I was complimenting him on his pertinacity. He would not give up. Listen to this letter:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 28, 1935.

HON. SAM D. McREYNOLDS,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR JUDGE McREYNOLDS: Hon. SOL BLOOM has requested me to submit a report on House Joint Resolution No. 210 providing for the participation of the United States in a universal and international exhibition to be held at Brussels, Belgium, in 1935.

In a letter of March 6, 1935, I gave you a résumé of the steps taken subsequent to the receipt of the formal invitation from the Belgian Ambassador to the Government of the United States to be represented at the exposition, including a review of a previous letter dated June 16, 1934, and a statement of developments subsequent to that date. The pertinent parts of the letter of June 16, 1934, are as follows:

"The invitation was received in a note from the Belgian Ambassador dated January 22, 1927.

That was 8 years ago—and since this time the Department has been in correspondence with the other interested departments with a view to deciding definitely whether the invitation should be accepted.

Now comes the main part of it:

As time passed, however, and it became desirable to make some definitive reply to the Belgian Ambassador, the matter was discussed at a meeting of the Cabinet held on November 17, 1933. The question of requesting Congress for a suitable appropriation to defray the expenses of American participation at the exposition came up for discussion but was not favorably considered.

They turned it down, but still it comes up. It is like Banquo's ghost. The gentleman from New York just kept after them, and finally the Secretary of State said, "Well, Sol, if you are going to worry the life out of me, go on and pass your bill and I will not raise any objection to it." There is the situation. It does not come from the Department of State, it does not come from the Secretary of State, it does not come from the Government of the United States, but through the Secretary of State it comes from the Honorable SOL BLOOM, and he says it in this letter which I have just read.

Now, let us see about the bill.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. BLOOM. Why does the gentleman stop reading there? There are many more words after that.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the rest of that is what the gentleman from New York forced him to do. The gentleman forces me to do many things, I like him so well. He gets down close to you and you cannot turn him down. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman read about three more lines?

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. The gentleman will vote for the bill, will he not?

Mr. BLANTON. I want to save this $25,000. I am going to try to kill it, if I can, but want to kill it without pain and give it a decent burial. I want to kill it by an opiate that will not cause any pain. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman please read the other three lines?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a minute I will.

Now, the gentleman from New York told you emphatically that this was not a junket, did he not? He said there could not be any junket under this bill. The gentleman is not a lawyer; he is a contractor. If he were a lawyer, he would know there could be a junket under this bill. The language is plain and I want to read it—

Which Departments—

That is, our Departments of Commerce and State down here—may, with the approval of the Secretary of State, designate officials or employees of their Departments or branches to assist the Commissioner General, but no such official or employee so designated shall receive a salary in excess of the amount which he has been receiving in the Department or branch thus employed.

Now, they employ a Commissioner General, who will be our good friend, Sol Bloom. He cannot draw a salary more than his $10,000 salary, that is true; but he can draw his expenses, which means the expense of himself and his retinue of servants that he will take over there with him, because he could not travel without servants. He must have his valet [laughter] to help him put on the right colored necktie in the morning and to have the proper silk trousers shortened to the knee in the evening. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Texas 5 additional minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Now, let us see the next provision in the bill:

Plus such reasonable additional allowance for expenses as may be deemed proper by the Secretary of State.

The Secretary of State could allow them round-trip transportation and a per diem of $15, $20, $30, $40, or $50 a day if he wanted to. There is nothing in this bill to stop him. Just what he says shall be allowed will be allowed under this bill, because the gentleman from New York has so written it. Now, that is the way this $25,000 is going to be frittered away.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman has every confidence in the world in our Secretary of State, Mr. Cordell Hull, has he not?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I did when he turned this $25,000 bill down.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman said he was going to try to kill the bill; but he should not try to murder it.

Mr. BLANTON. No. I am going to give it a sleeping potion, which will be just as deadly.

Mr. BLOOM. Well, I do not know; but permit me to say this: The gentleman knows that that could not happen under the present rules and regulations of any Department.

Mr. BLANTON. I will say frankly if they are going to send anybody over there I want to see the gentleman from New York sent. I think he will do us more good than anybody else. But this is no time to be wasting $25,000 on an exhibition that is half over. That exhibition is going on right now. The gentleman will not deny that. It takes a long time to get up an exhibit. This is May 15, 1935. This bill has to go to the Senate and either displace some other important legislation or await its turn. How does the gentleman expect to have it passed over there and get it into law and set up an exhibition before this summer is over? The Secretary of State, Hon. Cordell Hull and the Roosevelt Cabinet did right in 1933 when they met and considered this matter and turned down this invitation that was extended back in 1927.

Now, what are you going to do with a thing like this? What is this good business man here [Mr. MERRITT of Connecticut] who is one of the wisest business men on the Republican side of the House going to do? He is going to turn it down just as Secretary Hull did. I am such a friend of this administration that I am going to follow Secretary Hull and the Cabinet and try to save this $25,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has consumed 10 minutes.

Mr. FISH. Does the gentleman desire some more time?

Mr. BLANTON. I would like about 2 additional minutes.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman tell us about the manicure? I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. I would not want Sol to go over there unless he was properly manicured [laughter]; and he will be. There is nothing that any of you society men do that he will not do over there. Sol, help us beat this bill. It ought not to pass. We ought to save this $25,000. The people back home need it.

Mr. BLOOM. I will say to the gentleman that after listening to him attack the bill I know he has left such a good impression that the bill is going to pass unanimously, and the gentleman himself is going to vote for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. I am glad my friend is optimistic, but he certainly has a great disappointment awaiting him, because we are not going to let this $25,000 bill pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I thought I was going to be able to get through the day without taking the floor to put up a fight against some of these bills which the Committee on Foreign Affairs brought out. I restrained myself with considerable difficulty on the last bill that was considered, because I believe that bill really ought not to have passed in the shape it was presented.

One other bill providing for about $10,000 was a severe strain on my good nature. The pending bill is brought before us without any hearings or statement whatever that would justify anybody in voting for it.

As I understand the situation it is something like this, and it seems to be undisputed: The Belgian Government decided on this exposition way back 8 years ago.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs is going to ask unanimous consent to withdraw this bill from consideration. I take it the gentleman will not object.

Mr. TABER. I cannot object to that.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration House Joint Resolution 210, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw House Joint Resolution 210 for the participation of the United States in a universal and international exhibition at Brussels, Belgium, in 1935 from consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

INTERNATIONAL TECHNICAL COMMITTEE OF AERIAL LEGAL EXPERTS

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 6673) to provide for an annual appropriation to meet the share of the United States toward the expenses of the International Technical Committee on Aerial Legal Experts and for participation in the meetings of the International Technical Committee of Aerial Legal Experts and the commissions established by that Committee, and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I think this bill ought to be explained. I object.

The SPEAKER. The bill is on the Union Calendar.

Accordingly the Committee resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 6673, with Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill may be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill contains two authorizations; the first is to take care of the dues of this country in the aerial legal congress, the second is to pay the expenses of the delegates who attend.

The purpose of this conference is to establish international laws on aviation and aviation rights. Experts are appointed by the different countries participating. At the present time 33 countries participate in this congress. The annual dues for each and every country, whether it be large or small, is 1,000 gold francs. It will be noticed that the first part of this bill is rather unusual. It authorizes an annual appropriation to pay the pro rata share of the United States in the expense of the International Technical Committee of Aerial Legal Experts. Our fixed dues under the authorization of 1931 are $250, equal to the 1,000 gold francs.

The dues, as I stated, are the same for small countries as for large countries. This is unusual because in conferences of this kind, as a rule, the larger countries are taxed more than the smaller countries. The reason this provision is worded in this way is on account of the exchange, and you can see very readily why it is done. The dues, however, are 1,000 gold francs plus whatever the exchange may be; and this is the reason for the provision being drafted as it is.

We have been a member of this convention for some time, but have never sent any delegates to it at the expense of the Government. There have been people in this country who were so interested in trying to establish the aerial law of the world that they have gone at their own expense.

Two regular conferences have been held, one in Warsaw in 1929 and one in Brussels in 1933. This country was not represented at the Warsaw conference. At the 1929 conference the countries participating agreed on certain principles which they thought should be adopted as the law affecting certain aerial subjects. While we were not represented, yet when that memorandum or agreement was brought to this country it was ratified by our Senate and we became a party thereto. In the 1933 conference at Brussels, Mr. Cooper, an attorney from Jacksonville, Fla., was present at his own expense. Certain recommendations were made in that conference.

Nothing done at this international congress is binding on this country until ratified by the Senate, but I am sure the Members of the House can see the reason and the necessity for uniform aerial laws. For instance, we are close to South America, and our machines are flying over South American countries almost daily. There should be some uniformity of the laws in those countries controlling the rights to fly, license requirements, insurance requirements, and relating to the settlement of damages which may occur. Since the perfection and use of this modern means of transportation these matters become of the utmost importance not only in the Americas but also in Europe, where our people flying as passengers in European planes would be affected and where even our own planes sometimes fly.

If these laws are to be established as international laws wherein the people of the United States are so vitally interested is it not proper that we grant the small authorization here sought with this authorization granted we may send our representatives to these congresses to help formulate these laws?

We have a group of four men known as "commissioners", aerial experts, who are appointed by the State Department as members of a commission. They meet twice a year, in the spring and in the fall, and the general conference meets after their report.

The Department of Commerce recommends the pending bill and asks its passage. This, too, is the attitude and request of the State Department.

In this bill we ask only for an authorization of $6,500 to guarantee that we shall have delegates at the next conference which meets in Lisbon.

I trust there will be no opposition to this bill. I feel that it is to the great interest of the public of the United States that we be in on the ground floor and have a voice in formulating these laws, just as we have had in the formulation of the maritime laws operating throughout the world.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I agree with the distinguished chairman of the committee that this proposal is sound, logical, and constructive. There is no real reason why we should not send delegates over to this conference in order to know what is going on and to help codify aviation laws. Certainly we cannot lose anything by it, and, on the other hand, may gain a great deal.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to my colleague the gentleman from New York, the watchdog of the Treasury [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I have not any doubt but what we need representation at this conference, but why we should need $6,500 to send a good lawyer from the Attorney General's office is beyond me. I believe that is the Department the delegate should come from if we are going to get one who is prepared to work out the situation. I feel we ought to cut this at least one-half.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman knows that this is merely an authorization. It will come before the committee of which the gentleman is a very distinguished member. If the authorization is too large, you gentlemen may pass on the amount, and I trust the gentleman will take that responsibility and withdraw his objection at this time.

Mr. TABER. When we pass an authorization the department is always after the peak of the authorization, and while this is not one of the big items that will come up from time to time, nevertheless it is an item that makes one feel we should not make authorizations bigger than we figure should be used by the department. I feel that this item ought to be cut at least $3,000. This is a rather large sum to take care of the expenses of one man over there, one good lawyer, and provide for such stenographic assistance as he might need, together with the $250 to cover the dues which are required. It seems to me that is all we ought to do.

Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take any more time than just state that when the proper place is reached I shall offer an amendment to cut it down to $3,250.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON].

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I cannot agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]. As the chairman of the committee has pointed out, this is simply an authorization, and the item will come before the committee presided over by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER], of which I am the ranking minority member. We will scrutinize very carefully any request for money to carry out this purpose. I believe we ought to follow the Secretary of State at this time who specifically requests the sum of $6,500 as an authorization, and I feel that the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] can leave the details to the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee and we will inquire very carefully into the matter when Mr. Hull comes before us next year. I do not think the Treasury is going to suffer very much from this authorization.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Public Resolution No. 118, Seventy-first Congress, approved February 1, 1931, providing for an annual appropriation to meet the share of the United States toward the expenses of the International Technical Committee of Aerial Legal Experts to be amended to read as follows:

"There is hereby authorized an annual appropriation to pay the pro rata share of the United States in the expenses of the International Technical Committee of Aerial Legal Experts.

"That not to exceed the sum of $6,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated annually for the expenses of participation by the Government of the United States in the meetings of the International Technical Committee of Aerial Legal Experts and/or of the commissions established by that committee, including traveling expenses; personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere without reference to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended; stenographic and other services by contract if deemed necessary, without regard to the provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5); rent; purchase of necessary books and documents; printing and binding; official cards; entertainment; and such other expenses as may be authorized by the Secretary of State."

With the following committee amendment:

On page 2, after line 19, insert a new section, as follows:
"Sec. 2. That the provisions of these authorizations shall terminate June 30, 1941."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to, and that the bill, as amended, do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6673) providing for an annual appropriation to meet the share of the United States toward the expenses of the International Technical Committee of Aerial Legal Experts, and for participation in the meetings of the International Technical Committee of Aerial Legal Experts and the commissions established by that Committee, had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF SCIENTIFIC UNIONS AND ASSOCIATED UNIONS

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 4901) to authorize appropriations to pay the annual share of the United States as an adhering member of the International Council of Scientific Unions and Associated Unions and ask unanimous consent that the same may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4901, with Mrs. NORRIS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State in paying the annual share of the United States as an adhering member of the International Council of Scientific Unions and Associated Unions, including the International Astronomical Union, International Union of Chemistry, International Union of Geodesy and Geophysics, International Union of Mathematics, International Scientific Radio Union, International Union of Physics, and International Geographical Union, and such other international scientific unions as the Secretary of State may designate, such sum as may be necessary for the payment of such annual share, not to exceed $9,000 in any one year.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Madam Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM].

Mr. BLOOM. Madam Chairman, this bill asks for the participation of the United States in certain scientific union conventions, and calls merely for the payment of the dues of the United States and only for the dues. In the report will be found the various scientific unions and the amount called for in the case of each one, which runs from $63.47 a year up to $5,077 a year. We have been participating in these conferences since 1922. Last year the same bill passed and became an act, but did not get over to the Senate in time to get in the deficiency appropriation bill. I feel and anticipate that one of the objections of the Republican watchdog of the Treasury, as branded by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], is that this will be an annual appropriation. In answer to that permit me to say that the Chairman of the Appropriations Committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], objected to the last bill because it was not an annual appropriation. He said if we were going to appropriate this every year, we should make it annually. That was his objection at that time.

Madam Chairman, there are a few arguments in favor of this bill which I would like to state, and at the same time I ask indulgence until I read some of the statements made by the scientific men of the different departments of the Government, as well as the chiefs of different universities and institutions of learning throughout the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. Madam Chairman, before the gentleman does that I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. BLOOM. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. This provides for participation in and payment of dues to these six or eight different conventions?

Mr. BLOOM. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. This will authorize our State Department to pledge our Government for the payment of these dues annually and it is also an authorization that would make in order an appropriation for us to participate each year. Suppose all of these eight conventions met at different times of the year, one meeting in February and one in March and one in April and one in May and one in June and one in November and one in December, if this bill passes, anyone from the floor, when the appropriate supply bill comes up, could offer amendments to appropriate sums of money for delegates to be sent to these various conventions to participate in them.

Mr. BLOOM. Not at all.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the language providing for participation would authorize the sending of delegates.

Mr. BLOOM. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon. This is simply for the payment of dues for the United States to participate. The delegates going over there would pay all their own expenses, all their railroad fare, their hotel bills, and everything else.

Mr. BLANTON. What I am talking about is the fact that this language used would authorize and make impervious to a point of order any amendment to pay expenses of delegates to participate, if the House saw fit to do so, but the main question I want to bring up is this: How is the gentleman from New York going to get around an adverse report by the State Department?

Mr. BLOOM. There is not an adverse report from the State Department.

Mr. BLANTON. The State Department before our Committee on Appropriations turned it down, did it not?

Mr. BLOOM. Oh, no; the gentleman is reading the Belgium exposition report. This is a different one.

Mr. BLANTON. Was there not an adverse report made by Mr. Carr on this also, when Mr. Carr was before the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. BLOOM. No; there has never been an adverse report on this at any time.

Mr. TABER. If the gentleman will yield, I may say to the gentleman that the Deputy Secretary of State, Mr. Carr, before the deficiency subcommittee, when we had the hearings on the $112,000,000 deficiency bill a month or so ago, said they did not urge this appropriation.

Mr. BLANTON. That is what I had in mind—the State Department, through Mr. Carr, did not urge it at all.

Mr. TABER. That is what occurred before us.

Mr. BLOOM. I do not know whether the gentleman from Texas would call this urging it or not, but I would like to read from the letter of Secretary Hull, addressed to Hon. SAM D. McREYNOLDS, House of Representatives.

I am strongly of the opinion that the benefits which would be derived by American scientists and scientific organizations from the enactment of the contemplated legislation would far outweigh the modest expense involved. I therefore recommend the passage of H. R. 6781.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] if Mr. Carr did not appear before the deficiency subcommittee after that date?

Mr. TABER. Oh, yes; it was sometime this spring.

Mr. BLANTON. And stated they did not urge it?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. Well, I only know what the Secretary signed and I shall have to go by that. Perhaps, Mr. Carr did not know about this particular bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say to the gentleman that this Mr. Carr knows everything there is to be known about everything there is in the State Department.

Mr. BLOOM. I agree that he is a most efficient able gentleman and knows about everything regarding the State Department.

If I may proceed, we must keep in touch with the inventions and developments in the field of science in all countries and we can do it best through these unions.

It permits our scientists to work in close contact with other scientists for the development of common problems.

The Scientific Unions set up standards of weights and measures, definitions, names for new products, and so forth, so that scientific works can be used in all countries.

The Scientific Unions help our scientists to learn new methods at first hand.

The Scientific Union helps toward international understanding and good will by the union of thought of the leading scientists of the world.

Even now the Geographical Scientific Union is engaged upon the production of an international map of the world, each sheet of the map being made according to the highest standards accepted by international agreement. Another study of this society is one of overpopulation, a report to be presented at the next congress of this society to be held in Warsaw, Poland, and published for scholars all over the world.

The cost per year is really nominal—$9,000 would be the maximum. Since the money is spent through the Secretary of State all unexpended balances would automatically be returned to the Treasury. No part of the money is used to pay transportation or personal expenses of any of the scientists who attend the international meetings.

The Scientific Unions publish pamphlets and bulletins of the latest information on various subjects which are sent to all the centers of learning in the United States including Government departments.

The presidents of 6 of the 8 international organizations are Americans. These are as follows: International Council of Scientific Unions, Dr. George E. Hale, honorary director Mount Wilson Observatory, Pasadena, Calif.; International Astronomical Union, Dr. Frank Schlesinger, director Yale University Observatory, New Haven, Conn.; International Union of Physics, Dr. Robert A. Millikan, director Norman Bridge Laboratory of Physics, California Institute of Technology, Pasadena, Calif.; International Union of Geodesy and Geophysics, Dr. William Bowie, U. S. Coast and Geodetic Survey, Washington, D. C.; International Geographical Union, Dr. Isaiah Bowman, president, American Geographical Society, New York City; International Scientific Radio Union, Dr. A. E. Kennelly, professor emeritus of electrical engineering, Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass.

Now, let me read from a few of the letters that have come from various people throughout the country, which will give you an idea of what the people in the different branches of the Government think of this measure, as well as people connected with various colleges throughout the country.

Dean Henry G. Gale, of the University of Chicago, writes:

Perhaps the greatest service of all has been to increase international amity and to secure recognition of scientific workers in the United States by European men of science.

Dr. S. A. Mitchell, director of the Leander McCormick Observatory of the University of Virginia, writes that the unions "are of very great importance to scientific work."

Dr. John A. Fleming, of Carnegie Institution of Washington, writes:

Already the activities of the International Union of Geodesy and Geophysics during the short period of its existence have stimulated and coordinated researches of the physics of the earth. Thus it has been the means of providing published data from all parts of the world, without which scientific and practical developments in geophysics, so useful to the United States, would have been much less fruitful and indeed largely impossible had our country stood alone in such work.

The Scientific Union publishes regularly data from 50 observatories in all parts of the world pertaining to the disturbances of the earth.

Dr. Isaiah Bowman, director of the American Geographical Society and president of the International Geographical Union, writes as follows:

I have left to the last the obvious advantages of personal contact with scholars working in the same field. This less tangible product of the congresses cannot be overemphasized. Not only does such cross-fertilization of ideas from country to country advance knowledge more rapidly through an exchange of facts but it introduces into the work of any given country the new methods and points of view that are so valuable in scientific progress. The effectiveness of American participation and the esteem in which our scholars are held are shown by the fact that 5 of the 7 unions now have American presidents. This of all times would seem to be the moment when we should reciprocate by cordial cooperation of the sort that official recognition alone can give.

Captain J. F. Hellweg, of the United States Navy and Superintendent of the United States Naval Observatory, states:

The international meetings have been of the greatest value in all the activities of the Naval Observatory. This value cannot be too strongly stressed.

Captain Hellweg says further:

During the last 30 years a large part of our fundamental work has been along lines in close cooperation with work recommended by the International Astronomical Union. The cooperative work on many technical details and programs covers many of our activities. For instance, there are 4 big catalogs, 2 of which have now been published and 2 are in the process of construction—fine examples of the cooperative work of the International Astronomical Union. In 1932 the investigation of the position of the equator was presented at Atlantic City and was in answer to the needed work along that line which was stressed by the union.

Mr. Henry G. Knight, Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry and Soils of the Department of Agriculture, states:

The work of the union has been of great benefit in securing international agreement upon questions of nomenclature, atomic weights, definitions, chemical constants, and other matters of general importance to all branches of chemistry, whether pure or applied. For this reason, if for no other, the work of the union should be continued, as there is no other organization performing a similar service.

Dr. E. C. Crittenden, Acting Director of the Bureau of Standards, speaking of advantages of the scientific unions to radio, states:

Radio is, of course, a subject in which the cooperation of agencies scattered over the whole world is desirable. Consequently, the work of this union has been particularly valuable and has given information which was not merely of interest scientifically but was also of great practical value in the discussion of international problems in the regulation of radio service.

Dr. William Bowie, Chief of the Division of Geodesy, United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, Department of Commerce, states:

The International Geodetic and Geophysical Union has been of great benefit in the fields of geodesy and geophysics by bringing together at its assemblies the leading men of the adhering countries, about 30 in number, where they can outline and discuss problems, methods, and instruments. * * * I should view the discontinuance of these international assemblies as a national calamity. I cannot imagine our great country not making it possible to continue these congresses and to enable the geodesists and geophysicists from the United States to take an even more active part in them than has been the case in the past.

Dr. R. S. Patton, Director of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, Department of Commerce, states:

It would be most unfortunate if this country should withdraw from the International Council of Scientific Unions and of its subordinate unions. The cost to this country for adhering to these organizations is trivial as compared to the great benefits that result from such contacts.

Dr. Charles L. Reece, president of American Chemical Society, states:

I am satisfied that the chemists would regard the termination of the opportunities for international conferences as a calamity.

Dr. Robert A. Millikan, California Institute of Technology, states:

The cessation of activity of this sort and of the opportunities inherent in the Union of Pure and Applied Physics for establishing international contacts and understandings in other directions would be universally recognized among physicists as a major catastrophe.

Dr. Frank Schlesinger, president of the International Astronomical Union, states:

In my opinion the failure of the United States to adhere to the International Council of Scientific Unions would be something of a scientific calamity. The amount of money that would be saved by this failure is ridiculously small in comparison with the benefits that would ensue from the continuance of our adherence.

This resolution asks for $9,000 a year, and as I stated before, it is simply to pay the dues so that we may send our representatives to these various conferences and unions. It does not call for the use of any of this money for any other purpose except the payment of our dues; and the reason we are asking for $9,000 at this time, which is a little more than was necessary before, is on account of the difference in the exchange.

Madam Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FISH. Madam Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to my colleague from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Madam Chairman, this bill is for the authorization of $9,000 for the participation of delegates to different scientific organizations throughout the world.

They run down as low as $63.47. One item runs as high as $5,000.

The thing that I want to call to the attention of the committee specifically is that a subcommittee of the Committee on State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor had hearings on the bill and did not include it. A subcommittee on the Appropriations Committee had hearings on it last spring, and Mr. Carr, Deputy Secretary of State, appeared before that committee and told us that he did not urge the thing, that it would not be a matter of importance, and he did not believe very strongly in it.

After these hearings it was turned down. If we are ever going to stop spending money, this is the time to begin. If a scientific organization is not important enough to pay its dues of $63, it ought not to exist.

Mr. BLOOM. It is important enough but they cannot pay the dues. If the United States joins, it must pay the dues. The organization cannot accept dues from individuals, it must be the country itself. The delegates pay their own expenses, hotel bills, and so on.

Mr. TABER. Why did the Deputy Secretary of State come before us and say that he did not urge it?

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman will see in the letter of the Secretary of State, Mr. Hull, that he would be very sorry if we did not join it.

Mr. TABER. Yes; I see what the Secretary of State said, but frankly, I do not see why we should do it, because after that letter was written the representative of the Secretary appeared before the Appropriations Committee and took the position that he did not urge the matter. Under these circumstances I cannot see why Congress should go ahead and authorize the expenditure of the money.

I appreciate that it is a small amount, and that is the only thing in favor of it.

Mr. BLOOM. We passed the same bill last year.

Mr. TABER. It was put on in the Senate.

Mr. BLOOM. No; the House of Representatives passed it.

Mr. TABER. It was put on in the Senate this year.

Mr. BLOOM. It came too late to be put on the deficiency bill.

Mr. TABER. It was turned down by our committee because we did not believe in it.

Mr. FISH. Madam Chairman, I yield myself 3 minutes. After listening to the debate, I cannot see any reason why we should not be willing to enter into these conferences. We might obtain from any one of them scientific knowledge that would be far more valuable than the few thousands it would cost the Government.

If this was a matter pertaining to the League of Nations, internationalism, sanctions, armaments, or relating to war or peace, that would be another matter. This relates to radio, chemistry, astronomy, and so forth. I see my colleague, a distinguished doctor [Mr. Sirovich] over there on the other side. We have not got all of the best chemists in the world, and we might get scientific knowledge that would far outweigh in value this small sum appropriated in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, in paying the annual share of the United States as an adhering member of the International Council of Scientific Unions and Associated Unions, including the International Astronomical Union, International Union of Chemistry, International Union of Geodesy and Geophysics, International Union of Mathematics, International Scientific Radio Union, International Union of Physics, and International Geographical Union, and such other international scientific unions as the Secretary of State may designate, such sum as may be necessary for the payment of such annual share, not to exceed $9,000 in any one year.

Mr. TABER. Madam Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Madam Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from New York. Your committee of 25 has gone into this matter very carefully. We think it is proper and we feel that we have given it more study than anyone here can obtain from merely reading the report and talking about it on the floor. I ask you to vote down the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TABER moves that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Madam Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mrs. Norton, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 4901, directed her to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill. The bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NEW MARKETS FOR OUR FARM SUPPLIES

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a very interesting and inspiring address made by our colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG] over the National Broadcasting Co. last night.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address of Hon. RICHARD M. KLEBERG, of Texas, over the National Broadcasting Co. network, 10:30 p. m., May 13, 1935:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, this complex economic world in which we live is full of problems. But it is not as full of problems as it was a few years ago. We have found solutions for some of them. We are finding solutions for more.

Let anyone who doubts this take a look around and then project his memory back to the drab hopelessness of 1932. The difference is stimulating, cheering. We are not out of the economic maze. But we are no longer stumbling around a deadly circle, either.

I believe that we now have in our hands, through legislative means, the solution of still another problem that has long beset a large and important class of our population. I speak of the problem of opening up new markets for our farm surpluses. Too often these surpluses have simply backed up on the millions that produced them.

If we can blast open a new channel for this dammed-up river and at the same time benefit all other classes, then we in Congress would be signally remiss in not blasting. It is encouraging to note that this new piece of economic engineering is simple and practicable. It will require no appropriation. It is easily administered. Its healthful and beneficial effects will be immediately apparent.

Of the 6,288,000 farmers of this country, nearly 6,000,000 are producers of fats and oils. By that I mean they produce cottonseed, corn, peanut, soybean, and other vegetable oils, or they raise livestock from which the equally healthful domestic fats are made.

These millions of American producers are now denied a huge market right at their front door. This market is largely in the possession of producers 5,000 miles away from our westernmost border. Now I am not an economic isolationist. All I say is that the edible fat market should at least be made available to American producers of fats and oils.

To give them this opportunity I have recently introduced a bill known as "H. R. 5587" in Congress, which will tax all margarine made of foreign oils 10 cents a pound. This will automatically and immediately replace Asiatic food oils in this industry by those produced on our own farms and ranches. It will open up new markets for our distressed American producers. Margarine offers the largest potential output for these surpluses of our home-grown fats and oils. The legislation I have offered has the simple purpose of putting the margarine industry on a domestic basis.

This legislation will not amend or in any way change the existing oleomargarine laws. It simply provides an effective means of compelling margarine manufacturers to use domestic products instead of foreign products. This will restore the market for domestic fats and oils to its pre-war status, without injury to any domestic group. Ninety-nine percent of the fats contained in margarine was of domestic origin before the war. Furthermore, my bill does not affect the importations of foreign oils for soap or other industrial uses.

Putting the industry on a domestic basis does not mean that the product will be substantially higher in price than when made from foreign oils. The difference is one of the relative price of foreign and domestic ingredients and whatever that may be is due to the difference in production costs and living standards of American and oriental producers. It will make possible the use of domestic fats in the higher priced edible uses. It is an economic waste to utilize these rich and desirable food fats as soap stock.

In order to adjust our agricultural plant to changed economic conditions at home and abroad we must find means of utilizing our acreage in the production of commodities for which there is a demand. The outstanding possibility along this line is the increased production of fats and oils, of which we import more than a billion pounds.

Because of the underconsumption of table spreads in the form of butter, due to the inadequate supply of this product and the inability of at least 25,000,000 of our citizens to buy it at prevailing prices, the largest market for our fats and oils is in the margarine industry.

If the legislation I have introduced is passed, it will prove immediately beneficial to American agriculture. At the present rate of margarine consumption, the replacement of imported oils by our own products would provide an additional annual market of over 150,000,000 pounds. This would require the cotton oil produced on 3,700,000 acres; the lard from four million six hundred thousand 200-pound hogs; or the edible fat from four million six hundred thousand 1,000-pound steers. In connection with the price of beef and pork to the consumer, the passage of this legislation will increase the value of the byproducts and offers an additional safeguard, therefore, against an increased price to the consumer for beef and pork. Thus more than 5,000,000 acres of our land would immediately be required in producing this quantity of additional fats, thereby relieving to that extent the need for production control of crops that are on an export basis.

The production of margarine needed to supply our deficiency in table spreads would require at least half the acreage that has been retired under the A. A. A. program, and would greatly benefit every agricultural section.

Thus we have an intensely practical method, through this legislation, of utilizing our retired acreage and in dealing with the problem of permanent adjustment of our national agricultural production.

From the standpoint of the public the enlarged use of domestic fats and oils in the margarine industry has a double significance: First, because the domestic product is of superior quality in physical texture and palatability; and, second, because of the effect of the increased buying power of American agriculture upon general business conditions.

It strikes me that everyone who is genuinely interested in the welfare of American agriculture must favor this legislation, when the benefits to agriculture are so obvious.

Certainly no consuming group can oppose the bill in view of the superior quality of the product when made from domestic fats and when its passage will speed up recovery.

Certainly the traditional policy of organized labor is in accord with the idea of advancing the field and earnings of American industry, thereby preserving the American standard of living.

Foreign oil interests are expected to oppose this legislation as they did the excise tax passed by Congress last year. Students of the subject believe that in the long run the Philippine Islands will benefit by this legislation, as they have from the excise tax. The error of their previous opposition is now recognized by many friends of the Philippine Islands. The Philippines now have a practical monopoly in the domestic market for coconut oil. This market will be further extended if our domestic oils move into the edible field, leaving the industrial field wide open to Philippine imports.

Certainly no friend of this administration and the existing policies of this Government to improve the buying power of American farmers can object to providing a practical means, without processing taxes, cash benefits, or expensive administrative costs, which will be helpful in bringing about and maintaining parity price for American-produced fats and oils.

For all of the reasons I have cited, we should pass this legislation promptly. It would benefit all classes and deprive none of any advantage.

The passage of my bill will not remedy the un-American laws which exist in some of the States, but it will make it possible for American consumers to buy a product with a standard of quality that will insure its wholesomeness and its nutritive value, and at the same time permit them to trade with the farmers of this country, who are anxious to buy the things which are produced in other sections and industries. It will in no way change the existing oleomargarine laws, but will correct the justifiable complaint of the butter industry toward margarine made from the products of the "coconut cow" and will provide a profitable outlet for larger quantities of home-grown fats and oils in the domestic market to the advantage of both producers and consumers.

Hearings on the Kleberg bill will take place tomorrow before the House Committee on Agriculture. Every American farmer and stockman within hearing of my voice is entitled to this information so that under representative government he may have time to express his interest in this legislation to his Congressman or Senators. By this means the voice of the people is heard in our Government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

An expression of your views on this legislation will unquestionably be appreciated by your Representatives in both branches of the Congress. The question to be answered is whether or not American markets should be at least available to American producers.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2276) to authorize participation by the United States in the Interparliamentary Union.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 2276) to authorize participation by the United States in the Interparliamentary Union, with Mr. JONES in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an appropriation of $20,000 annually is hereby authorized, $10,000 of which shall be for the annual contribution of the United States toward the maintenance of the Bureau of the Interparliamentary Union for the promotion of international arbitration; and $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to assist in meeting the expenses of the American group of the Interparliamentary Union for each fiscal year for which an appropriation is made, such appropriation to be disbursed on vouchers to be approved by the President and the executive secretary of the American group.

Sec. 2. That the American group of the Interparliamentary Union shall submit to the Congress a report for each fiscal year for which an appropriation is made, including its expenditures under such appropriation.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM].

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I am very heartily in favor of the pending bill. We have under consideration a bill passed by the Senate. I introduced a similar bill in the House. By reason of the fact that the Senate had already acted favorably upon this measure, the Senate bill was substituted by the committee for the bill which I introduced.

This bill provides for our participation in the Interparliamentary Union. The Interparliamentary Union had its inception in 1888, when representatives of a few foreign countries gathered informally to discuss matters relating to peace, to arbitration, and to the preservation of parliamentary government. These informal conferences through the years led to the organization in 1899 of the Interparliamentary Union, which has since existed. It is an association of more than 40 of the leading nations of the world, both in the Eastern and Western Hemispheres. This association has meetings annually at various places in the world. Two of those meetings since 1899 have been held in the United States, one in 1904 at St. Louis and one in 1925 in the city of Washington. For each of those meetings the Congress of the United States appropriated $50,000 for the purpose of looking after the incidental expenses and taking proper care of the delegates from foreign nations. The United States has participated in each of those annual meetings since the first six. Since 1911 it has made annual appropriations for the support of this organization and, with the exception of 1 or 2 years, has also made appropriations for delegates to attend those annual sessions. Those annual meetings are simply, solely, and purely for the purpose of the discussion of matters of parliamentary, social, and economic problems common to many and sometimes to all of the countries which are members of the Union.

Mr. MAAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Gladly.

Mr. MAAS. Will the gentleman tell us just what the primary results are of participation in the Interparliamentary Union? Is there a report made back to the House?

Mr. LANHAM. I am coming to that. I was trying to give a little incidental history by way of preface. This is a permanent organization to which the United States Government has for years contributed $10,000 annually. The appropriation, I think, for the current year was reduced to $7,500. The $10,000 which we have appropriated annually to this organization is in accordance with a similar contribution made by each of the countries of the world, members of that union, in our class with reference to population, resources, and so forth. This organization uses this money for the purpose of its necessary officers and for the further purpose of the study of the various questions which are considered by and discussed at the meetings of the Interparliamentary Union. Each year there are certain subjects of mutual interest which are discussed, and may I impress upon you that this union has no binding effect and can have none whatever, upon any member of the union or any representative of any country coming to attend these meetings.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I think this $10,000 we spend is money well spent, for it keeps up good feeling, especially between the Pan American countries and ourselves.

I am sure my colleague was here the last time this Interparliamentary Union met in Washington. There were over 40 countries represented right on the floor of this House. I attended every meeting daily and I was greatly impressed with the good that I thought came out of such meeting. I hope that the measure will pass.

Mr. LANHAM. I thank my colleague for his contribution.

Mr. Chairman, in my judgment this is the most profitable expenditure of money our Government can make in any foreign contact, because it gives us an opportunity to know what the people of the various nations are thinking about problems they have that are similar to problems we have, without any binding effect or force or obligation upon this country whatsoever. I think that to continue this contact and at the same time to know what these foreign countries are thinking, what their attitude may be toward certain problems, makes this a most profitable investment, small though it be.

The American participation—and each Member of Congress is eligible for membership in this organization—the American representation is in the hands of the American group of the Interparliamentary Union. Senator McKinley, of Illinois, was long the president of the American group. Lately, until he felt that he had to resign because of the state of his health, our beloved colleague from Virginia, Mr. MONTAGUE, was for many years the president of the American group. The delegates who attend from America report to the Congress of the United States the gist of the discussions held at the annual meetings and all things of interest that may pertain to problems similar to those we have in this country. This information also may be had at any time from the secretary of the American group. I repeat that in my judgment the good we get from this association, in which we have participated financially since 1911, is the greatest possible that could come from such a small expenditure.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. My colleague was a delegate to one of these meetings, a representative of our Government. I would like for him to state from his own personal experience whether or not the discussion of the problems there and meeting with members of groups of other countries of the world was, in his judgment, worth while?

Mr. LANHAM. I thank my colleague and shall be glad to recite my own experiences.

Mr. Chairman, it has been my pleasure to attend one, and only one, of these annual meetings. That one was held at Bucharest a few years ago, and my appreciation of this organization has resulted from my attendance upon that meeting and my subsequent study of the Interparliamentary Union and of America's participation in it. Forty or more nations were represented at that meet, South American nations, North American nations, European nations, nations from all over the world.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. LANHAM. Although there were two or three official languages of that meeting, each delegate had at his seat an earphone and just by turning the knob on a dial to the language in which he wished to hear the speech, and adjusting the earphones he heard it in his own tongue or in a tongue with which he was familiar simultaneously with the delivery of the speech in a foreign tongue by one of the delegates. In this way the proceedings of the whole convention were readily understood by men who speak different languages.

One of the subjects which was discussed at that meeting was with reference to underprivileged children and children in industry, and we learned something of these problems as they affected the various countries. From this interchange of ideas we got many helpful suggestions. Through this contact, which entails no obligation upon us, the findings of which body have no binding force upon us, we promote good will and a more cordial feeling among the nations of the world.

In this day, when parliamentary government is so seriously threatened, surely our Government, which is the very keystone of parliamentary government as it exists in the world today, should in every way possible promote this good purpose.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. At the last meeting in this country, which was held in this Chamber, there were delegates from South American countries who first spoke in Spanish, then would translate their own speeches into French, and then into English.

Prior to that meeting it was dangerous for an American to travel in many parts of old Mexico; there was such an unfriendly feeling in the hearts of a great many Mexicans against Americans; but I have noticed that since that meeting a better feeling prevails, and it is now safe for Americans to travel all over old Mexico. I believe that that meeting did more to bring this situation about than anything else that could have occurred.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield.

Mr. COLDEN. Will not the gentleman give us a little more information as to the scope of these discussions at these meetings?

Mr. LANHAM. Each year certain topics are selected to be discussed. These topics are studied carefully by various committees, certain committees giving study to some of the topics to be discussed, and other committees giving study to other topics. These committees assemble all the data and information they can secure with reference to these common problems, and the benefit of this study of these problems is given at the annual meeting where the subjects are discussed.

As I say, this has no binding effect whatsoever upon us, but it does enable us in a cordial way to know what European countries are doing and to know what the European parliamentary representatives are thinking, and it gives us a contact that is most helpful.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield.

Mr. FIESINGER. How many delegates from this country attend the meetings of this Interparliamentary Union?

Mr. LANHAM. Just as many as can be provided for with the funds appropriated. On the occasion I spoke of, when I was a delegate, I think there were 10. Of course, the only expenses are the expenses directly connected with going to and from the place of the convention and one's expenses while at the convention. As many delegates are sent as possible with the appropriations provided.

Mr. FIESINGER. And if there were 15 delegates the money appropriated would be divided to pay all or part of the expenses of the 15?

Mr. LANHAM. The gentleman is correct.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Not very long ago one of my constituents, a very fine young man, was killed in Mexico. Justice is very slow in being arrived at. The State Department is having difficulty. The consul is having great difficulty in this case. I believe this Interparliamentary Union might tend to make Mexico realize what she is doing. I am heartily in favor of this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. As against that one Massachusetts constituent killed in Mexico, the gentlewoman will remember two Mexican students who had been going to a university in the United States and on their way home were shot and murdered down in Oklahoma. This Congress paid their parents a large sum of money, because of their death. Those things happen interchangeably. Mexicans are killed in the United States and Americans are killed in Mexico. That always will happen.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Many more are killed in Mexico than in the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not believe that, because many Mexicans are killed all along the border. It will happen until the millenium comes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. There are far too many being killed in Mexico.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, may I say one or two things more? The gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM] has just called my attention to one of the reports on the Interparliamentary Union appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on May 30, 1933, which was presented by Senator BARKLEY, of Kentucky.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman from Minnesota asked about that and may be interested.

Mr. LANHAM. This is one of the reports. More extensive reports in detail may always be had from the executive secretary of the American group.

Mr. BACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BACON. Can the gentleman tell us what topics will be discussed this coming year?

Mr. LANHAM. Personally I am not advised. Perhaps the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM] can answer the question.

Mr. BLOOM. They have not as yet been given out. The council meets and they send over the list of subjects; then the President designates the people who are to go over there and be on the different councils in which the different subjects are taken up.

Mr. BACON. Can the gentleman tell us where the coming meeting will be held?

Mr. LANHAM. It will be held in Brussels, beginning the 26th of July. The meeting lasts about a week.

Mr. BACON. It is to be hoped that Congress will have adjourned by then?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. In order to give the gentleman an opportunity to clear the matter up, may I ask him this question? What connection, if any, does the Interparliamentary Union have with the League of Nations?

Mr. LANHAM. I am glad the gentleman asked the question, and I was just about to come to that. The Interparliamentary Union has no connection whatever with the League of Nations or any other international organization seeking to force its will upon any country in the world. It is purely advisory and purely for the purposes of discussion, information, and friendly contact of parliamentary representatives.

The Interparliamentary Union existed before the League of Nations was contemplated, is entirely independent and has no binding force or effect upon any nation and seeks to have none. Let me say further there was brought out in the hearings before the committee on this bill the exception taken by a member of the committee to the fact that at the last meeting of the Interparliamentary Union there was some discussion with reference to the Kellogg Peace Pact. Of course, no action could be taken that would be binding upon anybody; but if the Interparliamentary Union should discuss the Kellogg Peace Pact or any other policy of the American Government it is advisable that we have representatives there to hear what they say and to know what their attitude is. It is worth the money to know that, to hear it, and to learn what they think of us, because they cannot bind us nor can we bind them in this union.

Mr. MAAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MAAS. I appreciate it is entirely informal and involuntary, but will the gentleman explain what the mechanics are of translating those discussions into benefits so far as the legislative processes of this country are concerned?

Mr. LANHAM. Whenever questions arise of an international character, the information is available always in part with reference to the particular problems under discussion in the reports that are made annually to the Congress by the American group of the meetings of the Interparliamentary Union and in detail through the executive secretary, who has his office in the city of Washington.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 55 minutes to America's greatest nationalist, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM].

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, this proposal is entirely different from every other proposal that has come before this Committee today. It is purely a political proposal; that is, it proposes that we participate in the political affairs and in the political discussions of Europe.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from Oklahoma.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Has the gentleman ever attended one of these interparliamentary meetings in Europe?

Mr. TINKHAM. I have not; but I have read the reports, and I have here the agenda for the next meeting.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I may say to the gentleman that I have attended two such meetings, and he is very much mistaken when he makes the statement it is a political meeting.

Mr. TINKHAM. I shall read the agenda for the coming meeting. Of course, under ordinary conditions international economics takes on a political character, and I should consider a discussion of international economics a discussion of international politics.

I read from an official bulletin, the Interparliamentary Bulletin. Forthcoming Interparliamentary Meetings.

Wednesday, April 24 and Thursday, April 25

Subcommittee on economic and financial questions

AGENDA

To discuss:

1. Economic problems: (a) The protection of agriculture in industrial countries and of industry in agricultural countries. (b) The competition between sugar and saccharine.
2. Demographic problems. The position of overpopulated countries and the possibilities for colonization.

"The possibilities of colonization". This does not interest us. We withdrew from our last colonial possession in the East only recently.

3. Financial and monetary problems: Monetary stabilization and the question of an international currency.
4. Other proposals.

Friday, April 26, 4 p. m.

Subcommittee on juridical questions

AGENDA

The main questions before the subcommittee are: (a) The system of capitulations.

- (b) Harmonization of the Briand-Kellogg Pact with the Covenant of the League of Nations.

This is certainly a political question. This certainly involves us politically.

- (c) The codification of world law.
- (d) Questions submitted as examples by M. V. V. Pella, vice president of the committee.

Saturday, April 27, 10 a. m.

Full committee on political and organization questions

AGENDA

1. To hear the report presented by M. H. Loewenherz (Poland) on the preliminary draft resolution submitted by the subcommittee on the representative system on the legislative function.

Poland is a dictatorship.

2. To hear the report presented by M. C. Costamagna (Italy) on "The Publication, Exchange, and Rationalization of Legislative Documents."

Italy is a dictatorship. How, in the circumstances, can Italy or Poland instruct in free parliamentary affairs? How can Europe do so?

3. To hear the report presented by M. Cosma (Rumania) on "The Organization and Work of Parliamentary Committees."

Who has ever said that Rumania had a free parliamentary system?

4. Other proposals.
5. To appoint one or more rapporteurs.

Full committee on the reduction of armaments

AGENDA

1. To consider the attitude to be adopted by the Union with regard to the question of disarmament.

This is a political matter which the League of Nations is considering. Armament and disarmament are matters of the highest political character.

2. To examine the question of the manufacture of arms, munitions, and war material.

This is purely a question for Europe, purely political in character and having to do with the League of Nations.

3. To consider the question of the trade in arms, munitions, and war material.

This is a question of the same political character. European disarmament and like proposals are European questions for the consideration of Europe. Europe should not be permitted to impose her policies and her political systems upon the United States.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from California.

Mr. COLDEN. Since we are not a member of the League of Nations, does not the gentleman from Massachusetts believe it advisable that we should discuss these questions where there are no commitments?

Mr. TINKHAM. I do not believe we should put one foot over the threshold into European political affairs. If we put one foot forward, we are involved. I am going to show how our involvement through this very organization not only brought us into the World War but almost made us a member of the League of Nations.

Mr. COLDEN. The gentleman refers to them as European questions. They undoubtedly involve this country as well as the other nations of the world, and they are of concern to us.

Mr. TINKHAM. It does not seem to me that European questions, political in character, should be of any concern to us. This is the line of demarcation, it seems to me, which should characterize the American foreign policy and tradition which go back to the old admonition from Washington himself—no participation in the political affairs of Europe and no foreign entangling political alliances. If we become a member of an organization which is discussing these questions, political in character, we put our foot over the threshold. If we put our foot over the threshold, we inevitably go further. I am now going to show how this very organization really involved us, in my opinion, in the World War, and how it also nearly precipitated us into the League of Nations.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from California.

Mr. COLDEN. Our State Department is carrying on conversations with the nations of the world at all times. Why is it not justifiable that groups of our citizenship should meet with groups of citizens from other nations and have a proper discussion of these questions?

Mr. TINKHAM. Again, I simply reiterate what I have said: I do not believe we wish, in any way, officially to discuss political questions with Europe. If we do, we are involved. I believe the United States should not participate in the political affairs of Europe. Had we not begun to participate in them by joining this very organization, we should not be in our present economic situation, with our institutions shaken to their foundations, with unemployment unparalleled in our history, with enormous and ever-mounting debts and taxes, as well as a constant rise in the cost of living.

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from Texas.

Mr. LANHAM. So far as I know, the American representatives have never participated in any discussion involving European questions which were solely and technically European; but what harm can there be at these meetings in listening to the discussions as to the situation that exists?

Mr. TINKHAM. Because it is a move in the wrong direction; it is a move toward the political affairs of Europe and involvement therein. The direction is all-important, particularly in relation to foreign policies.

Mr. COLDEN. Will the gentleman yield further for a question?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from California.

Mr. COLDEN. I am informed that the gentleman from Massachusetts is one of the greatest travelers in the country. Did he not do that in order to get information and reflect the information of other nations? Is not the gentleman indulging in the very thing he is charging against this measure?

Mr. TINKHAM. I have traveled considerably but I have never traveled in my official capacity of United States Representative. I reiterate I do not believe that the United States should participate in any formal or official way in any organization which discusses the political affairs or even the economic affairs of Europe.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a further question?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the constitution of the Interparliamentary Union every member of every parliamentary body in the world is technically a member, and the gentleman himself is a member. If we are members ought not we to have a right to participate in their considerations?

Mr. TINKHAM. The question is, Shall we?

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Massachusetts is a great traveler. He goes to Europe to furnish the G. O. P. with elephants. The Grand Old Party would run out of elephants if he did not go there. [Laughter.]

Mr. TINKHAM. Now, I am going to read the history of this organization. Why were we involved in the World War in Europe? Simply because we joined an international organization. We put our foot over the threshold and were then drawn into the maelstrom.

In 1887 a voluntary delegation of members of the British Parliament and of British trade unions came to the United States to present an address in favor of a treaty of arbitration between Great Britain and the United States. They were introduced to President Cleveland by Andrew Carnegie.

There is no treaty of arbitration yet between the two countries.

In 1888 there was a meeting in Paris of members of the English and French Parliaments, at which there was discussed a treaty of arbitration between England and France.

In 1889 there was a meeting in Paris of members of nine different parliaments, including the English and the French. At this meeting, for the first time, the name "interparliamentary conference" was adopted.

In 1899 these interparliamentary meetings were for the first time given the name "Interparliamentary Union." In 1889 also the First Hague Conference was held, the purpose of which was stated to be "for the specific settlement of international disputes." The Interparliamentary Union was the original promoter of that conference, which was limited entirely to the question of specific settlement of international disputes. In 1907 the Second Hague Conference was called. In 1905 and 1906 the so-called "Algeciras Conferences" were held in Europe. In those conferences the then President, Theodore Roosevelt, interfered because we had already moved in the direction of Europe by joining the Interparliamentary Union and in participating in the First Hague Conference. This was the first intrusion of the United States into the strictly political affairs of Europe.

After the beginning of the World War former President Theodore Roosevelt demanded that the United States enter the European conflict, because we had participated in the two Hague Conferences. From this trend of participation in the affairs of Europe came the arguments and influences for us to enter a league to enforce peace, to which President Wilson gave his adherence. This was the philosophy and thought which finally drew us into the World War, and which finally threatened us with the covenant of the League of Nations to enforce the Versailles Treaty, a treaty of war and not of peace.

Entering the Interparliamentary Union, or entering the First Hague Conference, both of which we entered purely for the purpose of promoting arbitration, gave no excuse for the United States to join any European political body. For us to have favored arbitration was correct.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from New York.

Mr. SIROVICH. Does not the gentleman think from a political, social, and economic standpoint, it is a wonderful idea to have Members of this parliamentary body, the House and the Senate, send representatives over to an organization of that type, to at least present to them the finest example of what a constitutional parliamentary government stands for, without having any alliance with them.

Mr. TINKHAM. That goes exactly to the heart of the issue that we are discussing, whether we should have any political relationship with Europe.

Mr. SIROVICH. Not relationship, just an interchange of views.

Mr. TINKHAM. The French and English had an interchange of views regularly before 1914, and that policy developed into a commitment in the war which broke out in 1914. European history shows that preceding nearly every war there were interchanges of ideas, there were meetings of diplomats, all of which developed into commitments, either moral or legal.

My argument against joining this organization is that it has departed entirely from its original purpose, namely, to promote arbitration, and has become an organization which discusses political matters.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will my distinguished friend, for whom I have a wholesome admiration, state for the benefit of our colleagues where since 1889, there has been a commitment of the United States to any of the programs or policies of these foreign organizations, in which we have participated every year?

Mr. TINKHAM. I have tried, apparently unsuccessfully, to show that if we move step by step in a certain direction, there is an inevitable result. I have shown that we first entered an organization promoting arbitration, that we then participated in a Hague Conference, which also was for the promotion of arbitration, that this led an American President, Theodore Roosevelt, not long after to interfere in the Algeciras Conferences, which were considering strictly European political affairs, basing his reasons for doing so on the fact that we were a member of this union and had participated in the Hague Conference.

Finally, after the World War was declared, he argued that we should enter the war because we had been parties to the Hague Conferences. That was followed by a much more ambitious proposal, namely, that we enter a league to enforce peace. Mr. Wilson was lured into the war to establish and to enforce peace; then he evolved a League of Nations, which has been repudiated by the American people.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman believe that we ought to keep our missionaries and churchmen out of foreign countries?

Mr. TINKHAM. Oh, no; they are not political. It is political matters to which I refer.

Mr. BLANTON. If it is wrong on political matters, why is it not wrong on church matters?

Mr. TINKHAM. I do not consider ecclesiastical matters political. Some people, during the past 20 years, have tried to merge the two, but I have always been opposed to it, believing in the soundness of the old American principle of the separation of church and state.

Mr. BLANTON. Why would it not eventuate in harm for us to inflict our church ideas on foreigners as well as our political ideas?

Mr. TINKHAM. If the Congress of the United States officially should attempt to do that, of course, it would be objectionable. What I am objecting to is the action of this Congress in participating officially in conferences in relation to political affairs. I do not think we should do so. I do not think it is to our interest to do so. In fact, perhaps it is to our ruin to do so.

Mr. BLANTON. But this is not Congress. This is merely the individuals themselves. Each individual Member goes.

Mr. TINKHAM. In passing this resolution the Congress officially approves the action of the officials of this Government, paid from the Public Treasury, in discussing political matters.

Mr. BLANTON. We passed a law that provides passports for the gentleman when he wants to go to Siam.

Mr. TINKHAM. But I go as an individual. There is a great difference.

Mr. COLDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from California.

Mr. COLDEN. This Union discusses many questions that are economic and social. The gentleman does not construe all those questions to be political, does he?

Mr. TINKHAM. Probably not all of them, no; but enough, such a large number, as to make it very objectionable.

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from Texas.

Mr. LANHAM. The United States of course has been in this organization for many years. In 1904 the annual convention was held in this country at St. Louis. In what political controversies of Europe during the time we have been in this Interparliamentary Union has it involved us?

Mr. SIROVICH. That is what I asked before.

Mr. TINKHAM. I have not read all these data about the Union. They are voluminous, and I cannot detail each issue, but my point is that the direction that this Union takes, the direction it has taken, the political character it has adopted, departing entirely from its original purpose previous to 1914, namely, arbitration, lead us toward Europe, toward European political questions. I believe this is a dangerous direction. I believe it is now more dangerous than ever before for us to meddle in the political affairs of Europe, a Europe which is governed by dictators, by homicidal Communists.

Mr. COLDEN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from California.

Mr. COLDEN. Did not the gentleman from Massachusetts support the program for this country sending a delegate to the Agricultural Institute at Rome, which is also an international organization?

Mr. TINKHAM. Well, I had no objection to that. It was narrowed down to a specific subject, and I thought there might be some benefit in having the statistics which were reported to that Institute given to us, as they were the broadest statistics in relation to agricultural production that were produced. I regard that as different.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Can the gentleman tell us one benefit that flowed from that conference?

Mr. TINKHAM. I do not know that I can.

Mr. BLANTON. That is what I told the gentleman when I tried to get him to vote against it.

Mr. TINKHAM. That would be rather an argument on my side. [Laughter.]

Mr. COLDEN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from California.

Mr. COLDEN. On the same basis, why should the gentleman oppose the entrance of this country into the International Labor Organization, which deals with the problems of labor?

Mr. TINKHAM. I opposed our going into the International Labor Organization on the same general ground. The International Labor Organization was a part of the Versailles Treaty. It was the left wing of the League of Nations, the right wing being the political Court of the League. My argument in opposition was that if we entered either one, we should eventually find ourselves in the central part, namely, the Covenant of the League. As I do not believe that we should join any European political organization, my position is just as consistent here as it was in relation to the International Labor Organization. The Labor Organization is interwoven with the Secretariat of the League, with the political Court of the League, and also with the Council of the League, all political bodies, so I objected to making any commitments in that direction.

Mr. COLDEN. The gentleman is aware, however, that in the acceptance of the United States in the International Labor Organization, it was clearly stated that it was not to have anything to do with the League of Nations?

Mr. TINKHAM. That is true. That kept us out of the Covenant. But if we went into the League, if we went into the Court, which is the right wing of the League, and then went into the Labor Organization, which is the left wing of the League, of course, the argument would be overwhelming that we should go into the Covenant, and then we should find ourselves full members of the League. That is why I fought it so bitterly. So long as I remain a Member of Congress, at the proper time I shall oppose appropriations for the International Labor Organization and shall do everything else possible to withdraw the United States from that organization.

I wish also to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that the resolution before us is entirely misleading. It is stated that the amount authorized, $10,000, is for the annual contribution of the United States toward the maintenance of the Bureau of the Interparliamentary Union "for the promotion of international arbitration." Any question concerning arbitration was disposed of entirely by the setting up of the League Court and by the assent of some of the nations of the world to the optional clause of the Court which made arbitration compulsory. So the resolution on its face does not reveal its real purpose.

Another thing—I hesitate to mention it—is not this a genteel form of international graft? Does it not give certain Members of this House, and only a very limited number, a European tour? Does it not disburse funds from the Public Treasury to give free European tours to Members of Congress? I do not think the American people will look with favor upon this proposition to send a certain few select Members of Congress regularly on European tours.

This bill proposes to make permanent what heretofore has been an annual appropriation. You must therefore determine as representatives of the people whether you wish to establish a permanent policy of annually sending a few select Representatives of this House on a European tour.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from Texas.

Mr. LANHAM. It is only an authorization for a permanent appropriation, not a permanent appropriation. The appropriation still would have to be made each year; and, if for any reason the appropriation should not be made, it need not be made.

Mr. TINKHAM. It helps, of course, to have the appropriation made annually.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative.

Mr. BLANTON. On the question raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts, let me call his attention to the fact that our distinguished friend and colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH] has been a delegate one time. Here is our distinguished friend and colleague from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], who has been over there as a delegate once. Here is our friend from Oklahoma, JED JOHNSON, who has been over there one time.

Mr. TINKHAM. I have said nothing personally disparaging of the Members who have been delegates.

Mr. BLANTON. And here is our beloved friend, the distinguished former Governor of Virginia, whom we all love, Mr. MONTAGUE.

I ask the gentleman: Has it not been worth while, do we not get benefit from daily association with these eminent gentlemen who give us the benefit of whatever they have gotten over there? I think it is money well spent. I do not think this is a junket at all. They give the people in other countries the American viewpoint on all questions.

Mr. TINKHAM. My position, as I said, is that this Union is no longer accomplishing its original purpose, namely, to promote arbitration. The subject of arbitration is no longer an issue, with the League Court a reality, and with the right of the United States to go to the League Court when it wants to submit any question to it for arbitration.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from Texas.

Mr. LANHAM. Would the gentleman restrict arbitration to its military connotation? Arbitration does not refer solely to war and belligerent enterprises.

Mr. TINKHAM. No; arbitration is a preliminary attempt to settle international disputes and to avoid war.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield that I may make a point of order that there is no quorum present?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from Minnesota.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important matter. We should not dispose of a bill of this character with so few Members in the Chamber.

Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. TINKHAM. I am very glad to have the gentleman make his point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Let us finish the bill, we have waited here an hour to do it. How much time has the gentleman remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has 26 minutes remaining.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, if the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs will agree to an adjournment immediately after the House acts on the pending bill, I will withdraw my point of no quorum.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs will agree, so far as he is concerned, to the gentleman's request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from California.

Mr. COLDEN. I am very much interested in the gentleman's discussion. I would like to know the gentleman's position. I would like to know whether he is in favor of this movement to support international arbitration which does not commit our country to any alliance or agreements with other countries?

Mr. TINKHAM. The League Court, which we all know is a political court, disposes of the question of the arbitration of disputes. First, it disposes of them automatically as between the members; and, second, resort may be had to it by nations which, like the United States, are not members of the League. So arbitration is no longer an active international or national issue.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from Wisconsin.

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman from Texas a while ago mentioned three or four Members of the House who on one occasion were delegates to meetings of this Interparliamentary Union. Has it not been the practice to appoint different Members each year to attend these meetings, or are some Members reappointed year after year?

Mr. TINKHAM. I think the honorable Representative will find that a small number of Members have gone a number of times.

Mr. BOILEAU. I am wondering if these meetings are a benefit to the Congress of the United States and to our people and whether or not the maximum benefit could not be derived by having different delegates attend these meetings, thereby spreading out the wisdom that is received and the inspiration that they might receive by having this contact with other parliamentary bodies?

Mr. TINKHAM. That might be so, and, again, it might not be so.

Mr. BOILEAU. Does the gentleman state that the same men go year after year?

Mr. TINKHAM. I have not looked over the record very carefully, but I think there are, as I stated a while ago, a number who make the European tour rather regularly.

Mr. BOILEAU. I have not had this information before and I have no knowledge of it myself; therefore I think it would be very illuminating to the Members of the House to know whether or not it has been the practice of having as many go as we can possibly accommodate with the small appropriation. Can the gentleman give us any information as to how the delegates are selected; that is, are they selected by the Speaker of the House, the President of the Senate, or by whom?

Mr. TINKHAM. I understand the selection is made by an executive committee of the American section of this organization. I suppose there are certain members who submit requests to go, and it may be that selection is made according to seniority or in some other way. I do not know. I think the honorable Representative from Texas can tell us how the selection is made.

Mr. LANHAM. It is made by the official board of the American interparliamentary group. Governor MONTAGUE has been president of this group up to this time. Senator BARKLEY, of Kentucky, is now president of the group.

Mr. TINKHAM. Have these gentlemen gone rather regularly to the conferences?

Mr. LANHAM. Senator BARKLEY, I believe, attended two. Governor MONTAGUE, as the president, attended regularly, because he has had in his charge necessarily over there the supervision of the conferences of the American group within itself.

Mr. TINKHAM. Are not the selections made by the executive committee of which they are members, or are they made by the president?

Mr. LANHAM. The president of the American group. Each Member of the American Congress is a member of the American group of the Interparliamentary Union. The meetings of the American group of the Interparliamentary Union are held here each year. Each Member of Congress gets a notice. The gentleman from Massachusetts received notice of the meeting of the American group of the Interparliamentary Union recently held, at which these matters were discussed. Of course, it has always been incumbent upon the president of the group to go if he can because he supervises the conferences of the representatives of the American group.

Mr. TINKHAM. Do I understand the president of the group selects the members who are to go?

Mr. LANHAM. It is made, I understand, by the President and other officers of the group. However, this has included from time to time many Members who have no connection whatever with the official organization of the American group. I had none. The gentleman from New York had none, and the gentleman from Oklahoma had none. At the one meeting which I attended there were only two, as I recall, who were members of the official body of the American group.

Mr. TINKHAM. The honorable Representative from Texas is then a little uncertain how the selections are actually made?

Mr. LANHAM. They are made by the American group itself.

Mr. TINKHAM. Does the gentleman mean by the whole group?

Mr. LANHAM. I do not know. They have not been made as yet for this year. The American group will determine the matter for itself as to the representatives that will go.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from Wisconsin.

Mr. BOILEAU. Can the gentleman advise the House as to the number of delegates sent over there each year?

Mr. TINKHAM. I shall have to refer you to the honorable Representative from Texas.

Mr. LANHAM. I may say to the gentleman that I made reference to that matter in my remarks upon this bill. The number that can go is necessarily restricted, of course, by the appropriation, although it has been customary to try to get the presence of any Members of Congress who may be in Europe in addition to those who may be sent over under this appropriation. There are others who go at their own expense. It is sought to have as large a representation as possible. The expenses of all the delegates every year have not been paid in full. The expenses, too, I may say, are paid only to the meeting, during the meeting, and for the return trip. There is nothing allowed for incidental expenses. If one wants to travel around Europe or anything of that kind, no allowance is made. The amount appropriated is apportioned upon vouchers approved by the State Department for the expenses of the delegates. It may be said that sometimes the amount received by each delegate has not been sufficient to meet the actual expenses of going to the meeting.

Mr. BOILEAU. There are usually 5 members, 10 members, or 20 members?

Mr. LANHAM. On the one occasion I went, I should say there were 10 or 12.

Mr. BOILEAU. And the $10,000 is divided up equally among those who attend?

Mr. LANHAM. The money is not divided among them; no. They present vouchers covering their actual expenses. These vouchers are scrutinized by the State Department and gone over very carefully to see that they are restricted to the necessary expenses incident to the trip to attend the Interparliamentary Union and return.

Mr. BOILEAU. It means practically the same thing; that is, that the $10,000 is divided equally among the 10 who attend?

Mr. LANHAM. This money is appropriated for the purpose of paying the expenses of the delegates attending, although it has not always been sufficient in the past.

Mr. BOILEAU. My interest is not in the sense that I have a desire to go, because I could not be reelected from my district in Wisconsin should I attend a meeting of this kind at Government expense.

Mr. LANHAM. Personally I think the gentleman would make a good delegate. I think he would find it profitable if he attended one of these meetings and that he would be very enthusiastic about them.

Mr. BOILEAU. I thank the gentleman, and I wish to assure him that undoubtedly I would receive some benefit; but I doubt if it could be communicated back to the House.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman from Texas yield to me?

Mr. LANHAM. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit.

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from New York.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have tried to follow the gentleman very carefully, but I do not know whether it is clear to me yet, and will the gentleman answer this question: Whom would I have to see if I wanted to go as a delegate?

Mr. LANHAM. I will say to my colleague from New York that I am not a member of the official board of the American group.

Mr. O'CONNOR. We have been trying to find out who it is.

Mr. LANHAM. Let me answer the question.

Mr. FISH. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit, my colleague from New York has had all kinds of difficulty getting any jobs out of this administration; can we not do something for him now?

Mr. LANHAM. I may say to the gentleman that, like himself, I am a member of the American group of the Interparliamentary Union through my membership in this body.

Mr. O'CONNOR. We cannot find out who picks these delegates to go.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. If the gentleman will permit, does not Mr. Call pick them?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Who is the executive committee? What is all this mystery about?

Mr. LANHAM. So far as I am concerned, there is no mystery, and I may say that on the occasion when I went, it seemed difficult to get a sufficient number of delegates to attend.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have no desire to go myself.

Mr. LANHAM. And Governor MONTAGUE, who was then president of the American group, asked me if I would go.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from New York.

Mr. TABER. It seems that the committee is divided into two groups, one of which is fearful lest they may be damaged in their districts because they go on a junket, while the other group is trying to find out how they can go on a junket. It is perfectly clear that this is a junket. It is perfectly clear that $10,000 of this money is for a junket. The report of the committee indicates that $7,500 of the money has heretofore been used in providing for the overhead of this international organization, and this bill proposes to raise that $7,500 to $10,000. It would seem to me that $10,000, or even $7,500, is a lot of money.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I have not the floor, but it would seem to me we ought to beat the bill.

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts permit me to say to the gentleman from New York that the annual appropriation has been $10,000 a year consistently, and it was reduced to $7,500 in the last appropriation, which has made it even harder upon the union itself, because of the variation in the exchange.

Mr. TABER. If the gentleman will yield, I cannot understand for what they even used $7,500.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Is it not true that the Honorable Theodore E. Burton was president of this Commission for a number of years, and was very active in it and very much interested in it?

Mr. TINKHAM. He was very active in it and was also very much in favor of our entering the League of Nations. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative from Massachusetts.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The distinguished gentleman from New York asked who selected these delegates. I am wondering if it is not Arthur D. Call who selects them. He did several years ago, and I presume he is still doing it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. He is not a Member of Congress.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. You would not expect a Member of Congress to select them.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Does the gentleman mean to say that an outsider, not a Member of Congress, picks the Members of the Congress who are to represent the Congress?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. That was my impression a few years ago.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, Senator BARKLEY, who is the president of the American group, was asked the question how these delegates are selected, and he said they are selected by the president of the local organization in connection with the executive council. There is no mystery about it, as suggested by the gentleman from New York, who is just as much a member of the organization as any other person in this body, and if he wanted to know or had any reason to have this information all he had to do was to attend the meeting when it was held. If he does not know, it is because of negligence on his part, and the gentleman should not try to cast any reflection here that there is any mystery about it.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable Representative of Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will look at the RECORD he will see a colloquy between myself and our former distinguished colleague, Hon. Theodore Burton, a Member of both the House and Senate during his service, where he stated that as president himself he had the control of the selection of the members to go over as delegates. He attended these meetings abroad many times. He had been the president, the same as Governor MONTAGUE has been president, and the same as Senator BARKLEY is now president. The president of our American group himself was the one who made the selection.

Mr. TINKHAM. Now, I have only 1 or 2 minutes left. The headquarters of this organization are in Geneva.

This legislation is taking us to Europe; it is taking us to Geneva, the political headquarters of Europe. There is no Member here who does not know that the vast majority of the people of this country are opposed to our interfering or meddling in the political affairs of Europe. Therefore, in my opinion, we are taking a step in the wrong direction if we approve this legislation.

This organization, in 1934, interpreted the Briand-Kellogg Pact, and at that time it was proposed that on Friday, April 26, 1935, there would be taken up by a subcommittee the harmonization of the Briand-Kellogg Pact with the Covenant of the League of Nations. This is a political act. It involves our treaty obligations. No foreign body should be allowed to interpret for us our moral or legal obligations. The course and direction of the foreign policy of a nation is one of vital importance. We are proceeding along the wrong road into European political affairs if we adopt the resolution.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, this is one occasion when it is peculiarly distasteful to me to rise in opposition to a bill, due to the fact that its proponents, Members of this House who are interested in its passage, are my friends, the distinguished Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Mr. McREYNOLDS, and my dear friend from Texas, Mr. LANHAM. I dislike to rise in opposition to a matter in which they seem so interested, but as to this apparently innocuous bill, a bill solely for the purpose of appropriating $10,000 for expenses of a delegation going to Europe and $10,000 for the expenses of the Interparliamentary Union, I feel as I did on the I. L. O., the International Labor Organization, when that measure came before the House. I opposed that bill and said that it was but another way of getting us entangled in European affairs. I do not want to go into a discussion of the labor situation, except to say that the American Federation of Labor 2 years ago passed a resolution, so far as the I. L. O. is concerned, excoriating it, and this last year, after Congress passed the bill, they merely mentioned it in their report, that since it was in existence they might as well have a labor man go over there. In this present bill you have the situation referred to by my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM], of discussing political matters in the Interparliamentary Union.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. In a moment. If this union was for the purpose solely of discussing parliamentary procedure, or anything like it, I would not oppose it, but when we get into a proposition with Europe, with Hitler and Stalin and Mussolini running their governments and our delegates supposed to sit in a conference, expecting to bring back from that conference something which is good for the American people, I doubt the wisdom of it, and I doubt the wisdom of their ever bringing anything back to us which will be helpful to our institutions in the United States. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Has the gentleman ever attended one of these Conferences?

Mr. CONNERY. I have not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Possibly if the distinguished gentleman had ever attended one he would not make the statement that it is a political conference. May I add also that the Interparliamentary Union, generally speaking, is composed of men and women from almost every civilized nation of the globe who are sincerely interested in preserving the peace of the world. Both Interparliamentary Peace Conferences I attended back in 1927 and 1929 made a profound impression upon me, and I am confident they did also on all the other delegates. I heartily agree with much the gentleman has stated, but I cannot agree that this is a political conference.

Mr. CONNERY. Of course the gentleman is entitled to believe that way. We had a disarmament conference down here in Washington that was not of the Interparliamentary Union. It was called by President Harding. They had the diplomats of the world there. The other nations scrapped blue prints, and we scrapped millions of dollars' worth of our ships. We do not want any more of those conferences. If we want disarmament conferences, we do not want them in the Interparliamentary Union under the auspices of the League of Nations. We want conferences where the President of the United States at any time can call over the premiers of foreign countries, or representatives of the governments of the world, to sit down at the White House where he may say, "Now, what are you going to do about disarmament?" Since the time the gentleman refers to, he knows that France and Germany and England and Russia and all the nations of Europe are armed to the teeth. They have plenty of money to arm their soldiers, but not a nickel to pay their debt to the United States. I do not think this is any time to be spending money to send delegates to conventions that are meaningless, so far as the United States is concerned.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. In my judgment the gentleman has made the most effective speech against this bill that I have yet heard. The gentlemen sponsoring this bill are good friends of mine, Mr. McREYNOLDS and Mr. LANHAM, but I think the time has arrived when we must stop passing bills because of friendship.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes more to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TRUAX. Europe secured a moratorium on her debt, and I think we ought to have a moratorium on European conferences, with our delegates' expenses paid by the Government.

Mr. CONNERY. So do I. I feel very deeply about this matter. As I say, I dislike to oppose two very dear friends of mine in Congress who are for this legislation, and sincerely so, but I think we have had enough of these conferences with Europe. To repeat that old axiom of Will Rogers, "We never lost a war and we never won a conference." It is true. It sounds humorous, but it is true. The diplomats that we send to deal with the European nations are not trained in diplomacy. Foreign diplomats are trained in diplomacy from childhood. We send over our amateur diplomats to deal with them, and the foreign diplomats always have the cards stacked against us before the game starts. That is the way we come out of all these conferences. I do not like that. I do not think there is any good for the United States in a conference of this sort. I am against it. I hope the House will vote down this proposition. It sounds like a small matter to say "$10,000." My friend the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] says it is worth $10,000. Mr. BLANTON is willing to allow $10,000 to go to Europe, but when we discuss labor matters on the floor he does not favor $10,000 appropriations for decent living wages for the workers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] has expired.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. TINKHAM. For a moment.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Now, the gentleman has had all the time he wanted to fight this out. I arranged the time to call this up for your convenience. Would the gentleman under those circumstances undertake to make a point of no quorum when he thinks he is about to get beaten?

Mr. TINKHAM. I want to defeat this measure, which I believe is thoroughly unsound and unpatriotic, by any method that is legitimate. It is legitimate for me to make a point of no quorum and I insist upon it.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman can never have the help of this chairman hereafter in getting time.

Mr. TINKHAM. I am sorry. The gentleman did not give me the time. Does the gentleman from Tennessee try to impose upon me by saying he gave me the time?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Did I not tell the gentleman I would hold that until he could get onto the floor?

Mr. TINKHAM. Oh, that is a different proposition. The gentleman said he gave me time. He did not give me the time; the honorable Representative from New York did that. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. And then we had to listen to the gentleman.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. TINKHAM. I will, but I am going to insist upon my point of order.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts) there were—ayes 13, noes 36.

So the Committee refused to rise.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has counted. Fifty-one Members are present; not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JONES, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (S. 2276) to authorize participation by the United States in the Interparliamentary Union, finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, when 257 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and he submitted herewith the names of the absentees to be spread upon the Journal.

The Committee resumed its session.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an appropriation of $20,000 annually is hereby authorized, $10,000 of which shall be for the annual contribution of the United States toward the maintenance of the Bureau of the Interparliamentary Union for the promotion of international arbitration; and $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to assist in meeting the expenses of the American group of the Interparliamentary Union for each fiscal year for which an appropriation is made, such appropriation to be disbursed on vouchers to be approved by the President and the executive secretary of the American group.

During the reading of the first section the following occurred:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard. The Clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TINKHAM: Page 1, line 3, after the word "of", strike out "$20,000."

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I have made a motion to strike out the sum authorized to be appropriated. This legislation proposes for the first time a permanent authorization for a committal of the United States to this organization which is now discussing political affairs and not parliamentary matters. It meets at Geneva. It is a part of the general international set-up of affairs or mechanisms which is favored by internationalists and international Socialists.

In my opinion, the United States is absolutely opposed to any such internationalism and internationalists, and particularly to international socialism and international Socialists. By internationalism I mean political internationalism. The United States has learned its lesson and has paid in part the extortionate price.

When the vote is taken upon this amendment those voting will identify themselves as being either for traditional American principles and policies or for new international socialist policies which would entangle us in European affairs.

It has been stated that none of the actions of the Interparliamentary Union are binding on the United States. The fact is, however, that before international commitments are made there usually are preliminary conditions and preliminary understandings which give character and direction to commitments. As I have stated, this is simply a movement toward Geneva, a movement toward entanglements in European political affairs. I have read the agenda which is to be considered by this organization, the Interparliamentary Union. I have shown that they are political and economic in character, that they do not relate to arbitration. Our joining this organization originally was because we were in favor of arbitration. I have shown how there is no more interest in arbitration and that now the matters that are discussed are political in character. Although it may be true that there are no binding commitments, nevertheless it is a movement in the wrong direction, toward political internationalism and European entanglements. One foot over the threshold into European political affairs and we are involved. What has been the result of our involvement in the political affairs of Europe, step by step, I stated to the committee perhaps an hour or an hour and a half ago.

I believe those Members of this body who are opposed to internationalism, international socialism, and to our participation in the political affairs of Europe should vote for the amendment which strikes out the amount to be authorized.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I merely want to say to the Members of this House that my bewhiskered friend from Massachusetts is responsible for your being called over here at this late hour after we had heard him nearly 1 hour on this subject. In 2 minutes we would have been through, and I ask you to vote down everything they offer.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, the time on amendments under the rules is 5 minutes on a side. The gentleman has no right to debate this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word, which is an amendment to the amendment.

The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I will not occupy much of the time of the House. The distinguished chairman of the committee stated that my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] is responsible for their being here. He is, and if he had not been responsible I would have been. [Applause.]

Any Member of this House is entitled to call the Members over here on any matter which he considers important to the people of the United States.

Now, this is the I. L. O., the International Labor Organization story all over again in another form.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is not discussing the last word.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, the last word is group. I will say, that to my mind, the Interparliamentary Union is a very bad group for United States representatives to join up with [applause], with foreign nations asking us to sit in on their Interparliamentary Union while they are passing out their foreign propaganda to us and then refusing to pay us a nickel of their debt to the United States when they are armed to the teeth, using our money to increase their armaments. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take further time of the House. I hope the House will vote down this European bill which is against the interests of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto do now close.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TINKHAM and Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts) there were—ayes 178, noes 77.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BOILEAU moves that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to delay consideration of this bill, but I had hoped to have an opportunity of asking a few questions of the chairman of the committee.

I have been advised that there is a gentleman who acts as executive secretary for the Interparliamentary Union in this country. I would like to ask the distinguished chairman of the committee whether that agent is a paid employee or whether he is working gratuitously because of his interest in the subject matter.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman means the clerk of the committee?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I understand he is a paid employee.

Mr. BOILEAU. Now I ask the gentleman from what funds he is paid; who pays him?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I suggest that Mr. BLOOM answer that question.

Mr. BLOOM. The secretary gets $50 a month and has been there a great many years. He is now being paid out of an appropriation that was made by the Carnegie Institute, which made a donation out of which this salary of $50 a month is paid. This man has been with the Interparliamentary Union a great many years.

Mr. BOILEAU. The reason I asked that question was because of the fact that it has been suggested to me there was a paid secretary. I was wondering from what source these funds were made available. I find no fault with the situation, and do not desire to reflect in any way against the gentleman who acts as secretary. I wanted the information, and I felt the Members of the House were entitled to it, because the suggestion was made that there was some other source from which the funds were made available for him and that it was a larger amount. I am entirely satisfied with the explanation made by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TRUAX. Can the gentleman tell us whether or not this paid employee—and I understand his name is Call—selects the Members of Congress who are to represent the United States in these conferences? The Congress itself, as I understand it, has nothing whatsoever to do with the selection of these members.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I may say to the gentleman that he does not.

Mr. TRUAX. Then who does?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. That question was asked Senator BARKLEY in the hearings before our committee. It is the duty of the president of the local union, which is Senator BARKLEY, in connection with the executive committee of the local union, to make this selection. The executive committee is elected by the Members of Congress who attend the meeting.

Mr. BOILEAU. Are there any other funds used to pay the secretary? Are there any other funds made available to pay any part of the expenses of the delegates to the Interparliamentary Conference?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. None that I know of.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. How does the proposed appropriation in this bill compare with previous appropriations for the same purpose?

Mr. BOILEAU. I understand there was $7,500 appropriated last year.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. It is the same amount.

Mr. BOILEAU. I understand there was $7,500 in the last appropriation bill.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is not discussing his motion to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman is speaking on the merits of the bill.

Mr. MAAS. Does the gentleman think there are enough parliamentary governments left in the world to necessitate such an Interparliamentary Union?

Mr. BOILEAU. I do not care to express an opinion on that matter, except to say that I hope there will be more of them in the future.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU] to strike out the enacting clause.

The motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 2. That the American group of the Interparliamentary Union shall submit to the Congress a report for each fiscal year for which an appropriation is made, including its expenditures under such appropriation.

Mr. McREYNOLDS and Mr. TINKHAM rose.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House—

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TINKHAM: On page 2, after line 6, insert a new section, to be known as "section 3", to read as follows:

"That all appointments to the Union Conference shall be made by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House."

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and the new section just offered be closed in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not in order at this time.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, if Members of this House and Members of the Senate are to be sent to Europe at public expense, which is the issue involved here, the selection should be made by the officials of these bodies. They should be made by the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate. It seems to me this is self-evident. We have had a debate here running an hour or an hour and one-half and it has been absolutely and completely obscure as to how these favored Members are appointed to these favored positions, having their expenses to Europe paid to discuss political affairs—political affairs largely, if not entirely, the political affairs of Europe.

This is a legitimate amendment. It is offered for a legitimate purpose and I cannot see how the committee can reject an amendment which provides that if public funds are to be expended out of the Treasury they shall be expended by public officials designated for that purpose. How is it reasonable to oppose such an amendment? How is it possible to authorize private individuals to dispose of public funds? How is it proper to allow Members of Congress to be sent to Europe or sent to Geneva to discuss international matters which, in my opinion, are entirely improper and out of order for American representatives in their official capacities to discuss, and not have their own officials say who shall be selected?

How can such an amendment be rejected in the name of honest and decent legislation, in the name of orderly government and of proper procedure concerning expenditures from the Public Treasury?

I submit the amendment is a legitimate one, is offered in good faith, and should be taken seriously by the committee.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts) the Chair announced there were—ayes 90, noes 82.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Mr. CONNERY, Mr. McCORMACK, and Mr. MARCAN-TONIO rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee demands tellers.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Did the Chair announce the noes had it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not announced the result. The Chair had announced the vote but not the result. The gentleman from Tennessee is entitled to demand tellers.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. As the Chair indicates some uncertainty, I withdraw the demand.

Mr. BLANTON. O Mr. Chairman, I was on my feet to demand tellers at the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Those favoring taking this vote by tellers—

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that business has intervened, that after the announcement of the ayes and noes on the rising vote, the gentleman from Tennessee was on his feet and moved that the Committee rise, and it was not until after that that a demand for tellers was made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New Jersey in relation to the point of order that the Chair had announced the vote but had not announced the result, and it was not in order for the gentleman from Tennessee to make such motion until the result had been announced.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONNERY. When the Chair announced the ayes and noes, did he announce the noes first or the ayes first?

The CHAIRMAN. The ayes first, but the Chair did not announce the result.

All those in favor of taking this vote by tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After a pause.] Evidently a sufficient number, and tellers are ordered.

The Chair appointed as tellers Mr. McREYNOLDS and Mr. TINKHAM.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 99 ayes and 89 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and the bill, as amended, do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JONES, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 2276) to authorize participation by the United States in the Interparliamentary Union, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill, as amended, do pass.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and two Members present; not a quorum.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were closed, the Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

KETCHIKAN, ALASKA, BOND ISSUE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, which was read:

MAY 15, 1935.

The SPEAKER,
 House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Pursuant to the provisions of House Concurrent Resolution 21, Seventy-fourth Congress, I have this day presented to the President of the United States the signed duplicate copy of the enrolled bill, H. R. 6084, entitled "An act to authorize the city of Ketchikan, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum not to exceed $1,000,000 for the purpose of acquiring the electric light and power, water, and telephone properties of the Citizens' Light, Power & Water Co., and to finance and operate the same, and validating the preliminary proceedings with respect thereto, and for other purposes."

Very truly yours,

SOUTH TRIMBLE,
 Clerk of the House of Representatives.
 By H. NEWLIN MEGILL.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SCOTT, at the request of Mr. COLDEN, on account of sickness.

To Mr. HOBBS, at the request of Mr. HILL of Alabama, on account of important business.

To Mr. OLIVER, at the request of Mr. HILL of Alabama, on account of illness.

HOUR OF MEETING TOMORROW

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning, with the understanding that no business of importance will be transacted between the hours of 11 a. m. and 12 m.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the House that I may explain the reason. We hope to conclude general debate on the legislative appropriation bill and to have a vote in time to adjourn over Saturday. We have numerous requests on both sides of the Chamber for time, and it would be a great accommodation to a number of gentlemen who want to speak on the bill if we could have this extra hour. That is the reason for the request.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Has the gentleman had sufficient applications to speak to take up all of tomorrow in general debate?

Mr. LUDLOW. More than enough. We will probably run over a couple of hours on Friday. Tomorrow, with the consent of my colleague on the gentleman's side, it is my purpose to ask to close debate at 2 o'clock on Friday afternoon. That would give us plenty of time to complete the reading of the bill under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. It is not the intention of the gentleman to read the bill tomorrow?

Mr. LUDLOW. No.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. Yes.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I have a resolution being acted on by the Committee on the Judiciary. It went over yesterday as the unfinished business of today and will be the first order of business tomorrow morning. I do not know how that request will affect that resolution tomorrow morning.

The SPEAKER. It would not affect the resolution at all, because, as the gentleman stated, that is the unfinished business.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HEALY] is reporting on that resolution. Has he been informed about this?

Mr. LUDLOW. I have consulted on your side of the Chamber with the ranking member of the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. TABER, and also the ranking member on the subcommittee, Mr. POWERS, and I believe both gentlemen are agreeable to my request. I hope the gentleman from New York will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. Reserving the right to object, as I understand it, this extra hour is for the purpose of allowing more Members to speak?

Mr. LUDLOW. That and nothing else.

Mr. TRUAX. Does not the gentleman think that in view of the small attendance now and the small attendance that will be here tomorrow at 11 o'clock, the same result would be accomplished by permitting Members to extend their own remarks?

Mr. LUDLOW. These gentlemen would like very much to have an opportunity to speak. I think no harm would be done to the public service or to any Members of this House by granting the request.

Mr. TRUAX. Only that we continually violate the N. R. A. and the 30-hour week.

Mr. LUDLOW. It will be an accommodation to a number of gentlemen who will obviously be crowded out unless we give them that extra hour. I would like for the House to know that in making this request for time I am thinking of a lot of very fine gentlemen who are our colleagues in this House, who would like to speak under the privilege of general debate on the legislative appropriation bill. I would like to accommodate everyone of them. That is why I am making this fight for extra time.

Mr. TRUAX. Does the gentleman assure us that no other business will be taken up at that hour in the morning?

Mr. LUDLOW. I can assure you that there will not be any other business of importance.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Well, that is just the point. That resolution will come up tomorrow morning.

Mr. LUDLOW. The unanimous consent request was that when we adjourn tonight we adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning so that we can get in an extra hour that will be devoted exclusively to debate and nothing else of any importance.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I understand this is not controversial.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the House that the unfinished business tomorrow is the resolution to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] referred, which has been reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. How would that be affected by my unanimous-consent request?

The SPEAKER. That would be the unfinished business, and that would have to be disposed of first on tomorrow.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I think that is perfectly all right. It will have to be disposed of in any event during the day. If we meet 1 hour earlier we will gain that much time, and the same end will be served. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CONNERY. Reserving the right to object, for the protection of my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. HEALEY], will the gentleman permit me to ask the gentleman from New York what that resolution calls for?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. That is a resolution of inquiry calling for certain information from the Attorney General's office on the kidnaping at Gallup, N. Mex.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW]?

There was no objection.

A TRIBUTE TO OUR OLD-FASHIONED PIONEER MOTHERS

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and to include a very interesting and illuminating speech by my colleague, Mr. JOHNSON, of Oklahoma.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, last Sunday, May 12, being Mother's Day, there was delivered in this Capital City a most eloquent and inspiring address by my colleague, Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. The address, on the subject entitled "Mother", was delivered before the Vaughn Bible Class, of the Calvary Baptist Church, Washington, D. C., one of the largest men's Sunday-school classes in the United States. This beautiful tribute to motherhood is of such Nation-wide interest that I have asked permission to have my colleague's address printed as a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It is worth reading and preserving. The address is as follows:

Members of the Vaughn class, ladies and gentlemen, and friends, today is Mother's Day in every town, hamlet, and community in this land. This is the one day of all days that good citizens everywhere, of all walks of life, of all trades and professions and avocations, pause to pay humble tribute to the sweetest, tenderest, and most revered of all names—that of Mother. As church bells this morning pealed forth what seemed to be the enchanting words, "Mother's Day"—"Mother's Day", the chimes of 10,000 bells rang out in our memory. This hour brings back to all of us the vision of the dearest face we have ever known. It revives all the countless and hallowed memories of the sweetest voice we ever heard. Although that voice for many of us here today is now stilled, yet we rejoice in the thought that we know in our hearts her sacrificial life filled with helpful and kindly deeds to others lives on and on, with undiminished power.

To those of you who still have your mother with you, let me remind you how fortunate you are this Mother's Day. This should be a day of special rejoicing and thanksgiving for you. Today is a great homecoming for millions of mothers. It is a day of unusual happiness to the living mothers of this land. Let me suggest that if she is not too far away you go to that old mother of yours before the close of this day and pour out your heart to her as you did when you were a child. Tell her how dearly you love her and how much she still means to you. She will understand and will appreciate your presence immeasurably more than any gift you might send her. But if mother is too far distant, then let me urge that you send her a message of love that will fill her mother heart to the overflowing.

It is not essential to discuss at length the origin and purpose of Mother's Day. It will suffice to say that although Congress, by appropriate resolution in the year of 1914, officially designated the second Sunday in May as Mother's Day, this great movement was begun many years before then. It was in the year 1904 that Frank Herring, of Indiana, then a young silver-tongued orator, began a Nation-wide movement to have one day of the year set aside for Mother's Day. About the same time Miss Anna Jarvis, then of West Virginia but now of Philadelphia, began a Nation-wide campaign to have a special day designated by Congress to be known as Mother's Day. Last Friday Miss Jarvis sat in the gallery of the House of Representatives while many beautiful tributes were paid her. I might add also the records show that many fraternal, civic, and patriotic organizations endorsed the proposal. In the year of 1910 a great Nation-wide Sunday-school convention met in this city of Washington and unanimously endorsed the proposed Mother's Day. It is significant that 10,000 Sunday-school delegates marched by the National Capitol, and that Congress recessed out of respect to this great body of men and women, and to the Mother's Day movement they were so enthusiastically sponsoring.

This Nation now observes many important anniversaries. Our people celebrate with much pride the birthday anniversary of men who have served their country with distinction. We honor and revere the names of men who have won fame on field of battle, of statesmen who have fought and won battles in the Halls of Congress, poets, artists, sculptors, and inventors, but this day is a different kind of anniversary from any of the others. Someone has said that this is a "birthday anniversary of an idea that became an impulse." But it is more than that: it is, in fact, an impulse that almost overnight became a Nation-wide movement to honor the name and blessed memory of the moulder of men and nations—our mothers.

There is no other love in all the world comparable to that of a mother's love, and there is no other day in all the year that challenges the best that is in us as does Mother's Day. The very mention of Mother's Day, my friends, makes millions of hearts beat a little faster; it revives all the precious recollections of the past; it brings before us the most beautiful visions and the sweetest memories that any son or daughter can ever have. Today, we see mother's tears, her smiles, and once again hear her laughter and sweet lullabies of long ago. It makes our eyes grow dim with tears, our voices choke with emotion, and our hearts throb with tender vibrations as we reflect upon the unfathomable love of our devoted mothers.

Today, we forget for a time our own cares, our own heartaches and troubles, actual and imaginary, and let our minds wander back to days of yore. In our mind's eye we see an old home out yonder, somewhere, in the beautiful past; a home where "love lit the flame upon the altar", and where the name of God was honored and revered. We see a home where parents were loved, honored, and respected, and where a full measure of love was returned. As we reflect back to the childhood scenes of that old home of ours we see mother constantly working for us. Often we have been made to wonder how a busy mother managed to do so much for us; how she toiled, slaved, and sacrificed so cheerfully and unstintingly that her offspring might be given every possible opportunity to meet and solve life's problems.

This day of all days each one of us is thinking of the years spent with our own dear mother. Everything else seems to sink into oblivion. We see her first as we cuddle in her arms and hear her as she hums sweet lullabies until the sandman leads us gently into realms of slumber. We see her as she tenderly tucks us away and then lifts her eyes from us long enough to utter a fervent prayer to "Him who holds in the hollow of His hand the fate of nations and, yet, who notes the sparrow's fall" to guard and protect her child through the night. We see her as she read daily from the old family Bible and taught us to say so many of her favorite scripture verses. Those winter evenings, by the old open fireplace, are so sacred to us now. It was there we learned to lip our childish prayer of "Now I lay me down to sleep."

Again we see mother as she hustled us off to Sunday school, rain or shine, year in and year out. Mine was an old-fashioned pioneer mother who didn't believe in sending her children to Sunday school, but oh how she believed in taking them there! Excuses didn't go in our family household. The Bible, the book of all books, was honored and respected in our old home and the Biblical injunction to "remember the Sabbath Day and keep it holy" was interpreted to mean, among other things, to be at Sunday school and church every Sunday on time.

We see her again as we attended the little one-room country school, and recall how she shared with us our childish disappointments just as she rejoiced with us in our pleasures. Never was she too busy with her sewing, mending, cooking, and cleaning to solve those terrible old arithmetic problems that we had announced had the wrong answers. Nor was she too engrossed in social affairs to hear and solve any little personal problems of one of her children. Not only was she possessed of dauntless courage but she sought to imbue in her children the spirit of never say fail. She also instilled ideals and ambitions that only a loving, thoughtful mother can transmit to her children. She willingly endured countless hardships and privations that her children might have opportunities that she had been denied.

Again we see our old-fashioned mother as if it were yesterday. Another son was going away from home for the first time to college. After each of the other members of the family had given him advice, jokingly and otherwise, my mother stood there at the gate of the old farmyard and as she gave her farewell kisses said, "Good-bye, son, write your mother as often as you can. Be a good boy, and remember mother will be praying for you." This world needs more old-fashioned praying mothers.

A few years later the same dear old mother stood at the same gate to say good-bye to her soldier boy who was soon to go across the sea to engage in battle, against those whom he had never seen, in order to help "make the world safe for democracy." Vivid in my memory is the picture of my dear old, horny-handed father—God bless his memory—as he proudly took me by the hand, wished me Godspeed, and declared he was pleased that his son was giving his services for the defense of Old Glory. I can see him now as he stood there gripping my hand and bravely striving to keep back the tears as he gave assurance that it was glorious to fight for one's country in time of peril. But the most vivid scene that comes before me now, the picture that one could never forget, is that of my dear old mother. She felt that the price American mothers were called upon to pay for war was entirely too great. She felt that war was so useless, uncivilized, and barbaric; in fact, she hated war, just as all real mothers must loathe it. Though her faith in God was unbounded, she had no faith in the idea, or should I say, propaganda that it was a "war to end wars." And I might add here, incidentally, that if no future wars are ever fought by the nations of the earth until same are sanctioned by the mothers of men who must do the fighting, there will be no more wars in the land, but peace will breathe as fragrantly throughout the world as if the day of its redemption had come!

My mother, who had endured droughts, diseases, hardships, privations, pestilence, and storms, stood the ordeal of saying good-bye very bravely. As she followed her son out in the yard for her parting words one could never forget the tragic look on her angelic face. I see her now, with her lips quivering and tears trickling down the most beautiful cheeks in the world to me. Although nearly a score of years have passed since then, it seems only yesterday that mother clung to me that day, and then at the final parting smiled through her tears as she whispered once again, "My son, be a good boy, write as often as possible, and always remember that mother will be praying for you." No one can ever know what that mother's parting words in the trying days that have passed have meant, not only in the months that followed in training camps and later on those long hikes in the rain to the front, but still later during those nerve-racking days and nights up in what they called "no man's land." During all those times I could hear my mother's audible voice gently pealing out, "Be a good boy and always remember mother will be praying for you."

Although my own mother has gone to her reward, I rejoice in the thought that the power of her parting admonition has been my inspiration and comfort in every trying hour. Just as mother's prayers were a consolation to me during those long, dark, and terrifying days, it was no less consoling in the years that followed to feel that dear old mother was daily praying that her son might be remembered at the throne of mercy. May it ever be our aim and prayer that we so shape our lives and personal conduct that it would meet with mother's approbation if she were here.

What may be said of the life and character of one pioneer mother could also be said, in a large measure, of the sacrificial lives of millions of our mothers who have graced American homes. Whether that home was situated out in the country, an humble cottage in town or a lofty city mansion, the inspiration that American motherhood has been to the millions of sons and daughters of this land is utterly incalculable.

Words fail us as we endeavor to pay our tributes to those dauntless, courageous, and sacrificial souls we are so proud to call our mothers. Our words are so empty; nothing we could say could add to her glory. But we might show our respect and sincere affection for the cherished memory of mother by doing our bit to see that the crosses of other mothers are made more easy to bear.

This afternoon the annual Mother's Day program will be held yonder in the great amphitheater near the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier in Arlington Cemetery. Eight years ago I attended my first Mother's Day program at Arlington. Never shall I forget how a sweet-faced but poorly clad mother, with shoulders stooped from many years of toil and whose hair was snowy white with the frost of many winters, made her way up to the Unknown Soldier's Tomb and placed a little bouquet of wild flowers on it, and as she looked up into my face very earnestly, she said: "Who knows, this may be my only son."

In yesterday's mail I received a brief letter from a lonely mother living in Blaine County, Oklahoma, in the district I have the honor to represent in Congress. The letter was pasted on the outside of a package containing the rose that I today wear on my coat lapel. I shall read the letter to you:

"DEAR MR. JOHNSON: In memory of the son I lost I made this rose for you and trust that you will wear it Mother's Day in memory of your mother you lost not so long ago."

The letter is signed by Mrs. Lola Cronkhite Higbee, Hitchcock, Okla. May I add that I feel highly honored to wear this beautiful white flower, not only in honor of the memory of my own mother, but also to honor the memory of the dear son of this bereaved mother.

As we revel in all the tender memories that Mother's Day brings us let us not forget those mothers whose hearts are made sad today for that son who did not return but who paid the supreme sacrifice. Then, too, there are many other good mothers who have lost their sons and daughters and whose hearts are aching today. Let us not forget the aged mother of Senator Cutting, that great stalwart progressive statesman who lost his life so tragically a few days ago and whom the entire Nation mourns today.

Not only are there mothers who are sad because of the loss of loved ones but thousands of other mothers are homeless, penniless, and hungry, through no fault of their own. On this Mother's Day in this the richest land on earth, there are literally hundreds of thousands of mothers who are wondering where the next meal will come from to give sustenance to their offspring. Beautiful poems and pleasant platitudes will not suffice for such unfortunate mothers. The humane societies take care of old horses everywhere when they get too old and poor to work, but in this land of ours there are at least 7,000,000 dependent and aged fathers and mothers who, thus far, have been ignored by this great Government.

On this Mother's Day let us reconsecrate and rededicate our own lives to the ideals that our mothers held so sacred, and for which they gave their all so unstintingly. Let us show our appreciation, our honor and respect for the memory of the motherhood of America by caring for the living. May the blessed memories of our God-fearing, self-sacrificing mothers ever be an inspiration and a guiding star in our lives, until we, that day, by the grace and mercy of God, shall meet our mothers yonder in a brighter world, where there shall be no good-byes, and we shall live forever with Him in the land where the sun never sets and from "whence no traveler shall ever return."

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1776) granting a leave of absence to settlers of homestead lands during the year 1935, which were, on page 1, line 7, to strike out "or"; and on page 2, line 14, after "except", to insert "upon proof satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior that the entryman is acting in good faith and is financially unable to make the payments due, and".

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL HOME-MORTGAGE RELIEF—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. BULKLEY submitted a report, which was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6021) to provide additional home-mortgage relief, to amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, and the National Housing Act, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the amendment of the Senate insert the following:

"That subdivision (6) of section 2 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, is amended by striking out the word 'three' and inserting in lieu thereof the word 'four'."

"Sec. 2, Subsection (k) of section 6 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(k) All stock of any Federal Home Loan Bank shall share in dividend distributions without preference."

"Sec. 3. (a) Subsections (a), (b), and (c) of section 7 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, are amended, effective January 1, 1936, to comprise four subsections to read as follows:

"(a) The management of each Federal Home Loan bank shall be vested in a board of twelve directors, all of whom shall be citizens of the United States and bona fide residents of the district in which such bank is located.

"(b) Four of such directors shall be appointed by the Board and shall hold office for terms of four years; except that the terms of office of the two such directors heretofore appointed shall expire at the end of the calendar years 1936 and 1937, respectively, and the terms of office of the first two such directors hereafter appointed shall expire at the end of the calendar years 1938 and 1939, respectively.

"(c) Six of such directors, two of whom shall be known as class A directors, two of whom shall be known as class B directors, and two of whom shall be known as class C directors, shall be elected as provided in subsection (e), and shall hold office for terms of two years; except that the terms of office of the directors heretofore elected or appointed shall expire at the end of the terms for which they were elected or appointed.

"(d) Two of such directors shall be elected by the members of the Federal Home Loan Bank without regard to classes under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Board, and shall hold office for terms of two years; except that the term of office of one of the directors first elected under this subsection shall expire at the end of the calendar year 1936."

"(b) Section 7 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, is further amended, effective January 1, 1936, by relettering subsections (d), (e), (f), (g), (h), and (i) as (e), (f), (g), (h), (i), and (j), respectively.

"Sec. 4. The Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, is amended by adding after section 8 a new section to read as follows:

"FEDERAL SAVINGS AND LOAN ADVISORY COUNCIL

"Sec. 8a. There is hereby created a Federal Savings and Loan Advisory Council, which shall consist of one member for each Federal Home Loan bank district to be elected annually by the board of directors of the Federal Home Loan bank in such district and six members to be appointed annually by the Board. Each such elected member shall be a resident of the district for which he is elected. All members of the Council shall serve without compensation, but shall be entitled to reimbursement from the Board for traveling expenses incurred in attendance at meetings of such Council. The Council shall meet at Washington, District of Columbia, at least twice a year and oftener if requested by the Board. The Council may select its chairman, vice chairman, and secretary, and adopt methods of procedure, and shall have power—

"(1) To confer with the Board and board of trustees of the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation on general business conditions, and on special conditions affecting the Federal Home Loan Banks and their members and such Corporation.

"(2) To request information, and to make recommendations, with respect to matters within the jurisdiction of the Board and the board of trustees of such Corporation."

"Sec. 5. Subsection (a) of section 10 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(a) Each Federal Home Loan bank is authorized to make advances to its members upon the security of home mortgages, or obligations of the United States, or obligations fully guaranteed by the United States, subject to such regulations, restrictions, and limitations as the Board may prescribe. Any such advance shall be subject to the following limitations as to amount:

"(1) If secured by a mortgage insured under the provisions of title II of the National Housing Act, the advance may be for an amount not in excess of 90 per centum of the unpaid principal of the mortgage loan.

"(2) If secured by a home mortgage given in respect of an amortized home mortgage loan which was for an original term of six years or more, or in cases where shares of stock, which are pledged as security for such loan, mature in a period of six years or more, the advance may be for an amount not in excess of 65 per centum of the unpaid principal of the home mortgage loan; but in no case shall the amount of the advance exceed 60 per centum of the value of the real estate securing the home mortgage loan.

"(3) If secured by a home mortgage given in respect of any other home mortgage loan, the advance shall not be for an amount in excess of 50 per centum of the unpaid principal of the home mortgage loan; but in no case shall the amount of such advance exceed 40 per centum of the value of the real estate securing the home mortgage loan.

"(4) If secured by obligations of the United States, or obligations fully guaranteed by the United States, the advance shall not be for an amount in excess of the face value of such obligations."

"Sec. 6. Clauses numbered (1) and (2) of subsection (b) of section 10 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, are amended to read as follows: '(1) the home mortgage loan secured by it has more than twenty years to run to maturity, or (2) the home mortgage exceeds $20,000, or'.

"Sec. 7. The Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, is amended by adding after section 10a the following new section:

"Sec. 10b. Each Federal Home Loan Bank is authorized to make advances to nonmember mortgagees approved under title II of the National Housing Act. Such mortgagees must be chartered institutions having succession and subject to the inspection and supervision of some governmental agency, and whose principal activity in the mortgage field must consist of lending their own funds. Such advances shall not be subject to the other provisions and restrictions of this act, but shall be made upon the security of insured mortgages, insured under title II of the National Housing Act. Advances made under the terms of this section shall be at such rates of interest and upon such terms and conditions as shall be determined by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, but no advance may be for an amount in excess of 90 per centum of the unpaid principal of the mortgage loan given as security."

"Sec. 8. The first sentence of section 13 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows: 'Any and all notes, debentures, bonds, and other such obligations issued by any bank, and consolidated Federal Home Loan Bank bonds and debentures, shall be exempt both as to principal and interest from all taxation (except surtaxes, estate, inheritance, and gift taxes) now or hereafter imposed by the United States, by any Territory, dependency, or possession thereof, or by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority.'

"Sec. 9. Section 19 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: 'The receipts of the Board derived from assessments upon the Federal Home Loan Banks and from other sources (except receipts from the sale of consolidated Federal Home Loan Bank bonds and debentures issued under section 11) shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, and may be from time to time withdrawn therefrom to defray the expenses of the Board, and the salaries of its members and employees, whose employment, compensation, leave, and expenses shall be governed solely by the provisions of this act, specific amendments thereof, and rules and regulations of the Board not inconsistent therewith.'

"Sec. 10. Sections 2 (c) and 4 (d) of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, are amended by striking out 'upon which there is located a dwelling for not more than four families, used by the owner as a home or held by him as his homestead, and having a value not exceeding $20,000' and inserting in lieu thereof 'upon which there is located a dwelling or dwellings for not more than four families, which is used in whole or in part by the owner as a home or held by him as his homestead, and which has a value of not to exceed $20,000'.

"Sec. 11. The first sentence of subsection (c) of section 4 of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(c) In order to provide for applications heretofore filed, for applications filed within thirty days after this amendment takes effect, and for carrying out the other purposes of this section, the Corporation is authorized to issue bonds in an aggregate amount not to exceed $4,750,000,000, which may be exchanged as hereinafter provided, or which may be sold by the Corporation to obtain funds for carrying out the purposes of this section or for the redemption of any of its outstanding bonds; and the Corporation is further authorized to increase its total bond issue for the purpose of retiring its outstanding bonds by an amount equal to the amount of the bonds to be so retired (except bonds retired from payments of principal on loans), such retirement to be at maturity or by call or purchase or exchange or any method prescribed by the Board with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That no bonds issued under this subsection, as amended, shall have a maturity date later than 1952."

"Sec. 12. Subsection (d) of section 4 of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"For the purposes of this act, levies of assessments upon real property, made by any special district organized in any State for public improvements, shall be treated as general-tax levies are treated. The Board shall determine the reasonableness of the total annual burden of taxes and assessments of all kinds upon any property offered as security for the payment of a loan made by the Corporation and the effect of the total levies upon the loanable value of such property, but no deduction shall be made from the loanable value of any property for levies not due at the time of making such loan in any instance where the total annual taxes and assessments borne by the said property for all purposes does not exceed a sum which, in the discretion of the Board, is a reasonable annual tax burden for such property."

"Sec. 13. Subsection (j) of section 4 of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, is amended, effective 90 days after the date of enactment of this act, by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: 'No person shall be appointed or retained as an officer, employee, agent, or attorney, at a fixed salary, in any regional or State office of the Corporation who is an officer or director of any firm, corporation, or association engaged in lending money on real estate; nor shall any person be appointed or retained as an officer, employee, agent, or attorney in any State or district office of the Corporation, who has not been a bona fide resident of the State served by such office for a period of at least 1 year immediately preceding the date of his appointment.'

"Sec. 14. Subsection (l) of section 4 of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, is amended by striking out the last comma therein and the following: 'or in any case in which the home mortgage or other obligation or lien is held by an institution which is in liquidation.'

"Sec. 15. Subsection (h) of section 4 of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a colon and the following: 'Provided, That no person shall be allowed to act as appraiser if he is in the employ of any company holding a loan on the property, or if he is interested in the subject matter of the loan.'

"Sec. 16. Subsection (m) of section 4 of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, is amended by striking out '$300,000,000' and inserting in lieu thereof '$400,000,000'.

"Sec. 17. (a) Section 4 of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection to read as follows:

"(n) The Corporation is authorized to purchase Federal Home Loan bank bonds, debentures, or notes, or consolidated Federal Home Loan Bank bonds or debentures. The Corporation is also authorized to purchase full-paid-income shares of Federal Savings and Loan Associations after the funds made available to the Secretary of the Treasury for the purchase of such shares have been exhausted. Such purchases of shares shall be on the same terms and conditions as have been heretofore authorized by law for the purchase of such shares by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That the total amount of such shares in any one association held by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Corporation shall not exceed the total amount of such shares heretofore authorized to be held by the Secretary of the Treasury in any one association. The Corporation is also authorized to purchase shares in any institution which is (1) a member of a Federal Home Loan Bank, or (2) whose accounts are insured under title IV of the National Housing Act, if the institution is eligible for insurance under such title; and to make deposits and purchase certificates of deposit and investment certificates in any such institution. Of the total authorized bond issue of the Corporation $300,000,000 shall be available for the purposes of this subsection, without discrimination in favor of Federally chartered associations, and bonds of the Corporation not exceeding such amount may be sold for the purposes of this subsection."

"(b) Section 9 of the Act entitled 'An act to guarantee the bonds of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, to amend the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, and for other purposes', approved April 27, 1934, is hereby repealed.

"Sec. 18. Subsection (c) of section 5 of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a colon and the following: 'And provided further, That any such association which is converted from a State-chartered institution may continue to make loans in the territory in which it made loans while operating under State charter.'

"Sec. 19. Section 6 of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, is amended (1) by striking out '$500,000' and inserting in lieu thereof '$700,000' and (2) by adding at the end of the section the following new sentence: 'The sums appropriated and made available pursuant to this section shall be used impartially in the promotion and development of local thrift and home-financing institutions, whether State or federally chartered.'

"Sec. 20. Subsection (d) of section 8 of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(d) The provisions of sections 29, 30, 32, 35, 37, 39, 112, 113, and 117 of the Criminal Code of the United States (U. S. C., title 18, secs. 73, 74, 76, 82, 83, 88, 91, 202, 203, and 207), insofar as applicable, are extended to apply to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, its contracts or agreements, and an association under this Act which, for the purposes herein shall be held to include advances, loans, discounts, and purchase or repurchase agreements; extensions and renewals thereof; and acceptances, releases, and substitutions of security thereof."

"Sec. 21. Subsection (e) of section 8 of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(e) No person, partnership, association, or corporation shall, directly or indirectly, solicit, contract for, charge, or receive, or attempt to solicit, contract for, charge, or receive, from any person applying to the Corporation for a loan, (1) any fee, charge, or other consideration, whether bond or cash, except ordinary fees authorized and required by the Corporation for services actually rendered for examination and perfection of title, appraisal, and like necessary services, or (2) any moneys, check, note, or other form of obligation, representing payment of any difference which may exist between the market value and the par value of the bonds of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. Any person, partnership, association, or corporation violating the provisions of this subsection shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than two years, or both."

"Sec. 22. Paragraph (5) of subsection (c) of section 402 of the National Housing Act is amended by adding the following sentence at the end thereof: 'The Corporation shall be entitled to the free use of the United States mails for its official business in the same manner as the executive departments of the Government, and shall determine its necessary expenditures under this Act and the manner in which the same shall be incurred, allowed, and paid, without regard to the provisions of any other law governing the expenditure of public funds.'

"Sec. 23. Subsection (b) of section 403 of the National Housing Act is amended (1) by striking out the words 'ten years' and inserting in lieu thereof the words 'twenty years', and (2) by striking out the period at the end of the subsection and inserting in lieu thereof a colon and the following: 'Provided, That for any year dividends may be declared and paid when losses are chargeable to such reserves if the declaration of such dividends in such case is approved by the Corporation.'

"Sec. 24. Subsection (d) of section 403 of the National Housing Act is amended to read as follows:

"(d) Any applicant which applies for insurance under this title after the first year of the operation of the Corporation shall pay an admission fee based upon the reserve fund of the Corporation, which, in the judgment of the Corporation, is an equitable contribution."

"Sec. 25. (a) Subsections (a) and (b) of section 404 of the National Housing Act are amended by striking out 'one-fourth' and inserting in lieu thereof 'one-eighth'.

"(b) Section 404 of the National Housing Act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) Each insured institution which has paid a premium charge in excess of one-eighth of 1 per centum of the total amount of the accounts of its insured members and its creditor obligations shall be credited on its future premiums with an amount equal to the total amount of such excess."

"Sec. 26. The last sentence of section 406 (b) of the National Housing Act is amended to read as follows: 'The surrender and transfer to the Corporation of an insured account in any such association which is in default shall subrogate the Corporation with respect to such insured account, but shall not affect any right which the insured member may have in the uninsured portion of his account or any right which he may have to participate in the distribution of the net proceeds remaining from the disposition of the assets of such association.'

"Sec. 27. Section 406 of the National Housing Act is further amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection to read as follows:

"(f) In order to prevent a default in an insured institution or in order to restore an insured institution in default to normal operation as an insured institution, the Corporation is authorized, in its discretion, to make loans to, purchase the assets of, or make a contribution to, an insured institution or an insured institution in default; but no contribution shall be made to any such institution in an amount in excess of that which the Corporation finds to be reasonably necessary to save the expense of liquidating such institution."

"Sec. 28. (a) The first sentence of section 2 of the National Housing Act is amended (1) by striking out 'January' and inserting in lieu thereof 'April', and (2) by inserting before the period at the end thereof a comma and the following: 'including the installation of equipment and machinery'.

"(b) The last sentence of section 2 of the National Housing Act is amended to read as follows: 'No insurance shall be granted under this section to any such financial institution with respect to any obligation representing any such loan, advance of credit, or purchase by it (1) unless the obligation bears such interest, has such maturity, and contains such other terms, conditions, and restrictions, as the Administrator shall prescribe; and (2) unless the amount of such loan, advance of credit, or purchase is not in excess of $2,000, except that in the case of any such loan, advance of credit, or purchase made for the purpose of such financing with respect to real property improved by or to be converted into apartment or multiple family houses, hotels, office, business or other commercial buildings, hospitals, orphanages, colleges, schools, or manufacturing or industrial plants, such insurance may be granted if the amount of the loan, advance of credit, or purchase is not in excess of $50,000.'

"Sec. 29. (a) Subsection (c) of section 203 of the National Housing Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: 'In the event that the principal obligation of any mortgage accepted for insurance under this section is paid in full prior to the maturity date specified in the mortgage, the Administrator is further authorized in his discretion to require the payment by the mortgagor of a premium charge in such amount as the Administrator determines to be equitable, but not in excess of the aggregate amount of the premium charges that the mortgagee would otherwise have been required to pay if the mortgage had continued to be insured under this section until such maturity date.'

"(b) The first sentence of subsection (f) of section 205 of the National Housing Act is amended by striking out the words 'premium charge' and inserting in lieu thereof the words 'annual premium charge'.

"(c) The last sentence of subsection (a) of section 204 of the National Housing Act is amended to read as follows: 'For the purposes of this subsection, the value of the mortgage shall be determined, in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Administrator, by adding to the amount of the principal of the mortgage which is unpaid on the date of such delivery, (1) interest on such unpaid principal from the date foreclosure proceedings were instituted or the property was otherwise acquired as provided in this subsection to the date of such delivery at the rate provided for in the debentures issued to the mortgagee, less any amount received on account of interest accruing on such unpaid principal between such dates, and (2) the amount of all payments which have been made by the mortgagee for taxes and insurance on the property mortgaged.'

"Sec. 30. Subsection (d) of section 301 of the National Housing Act is amended to read as follows:

"(d) No association shall transact any business except such as is incidental to its organization until it has been authorized to do so by the Administrator. Each such association shall have a capital stock of a par value of not less than $2,000,000, and no authorization to commence business shall be granted by the Administrator to any such association until he is satisfied that such capital stock has been subscribed for at not less than par and paid in full in cash or Government securities at their par value."

"Sec. 31. Section 302 of the National Housing Act is amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 302. Each national mortgage association is authorized to issue and have outstanding at any time notes, bonds, debentures, or other such obligations in an aggregate amount not to exceed (1) twelve times the aggregate par value of its outstanding capital stock, and in no event to exceed (2) the current face value of mortgages held by it and insured under the provisions of title II of this Act, plus the amount of its cash on hand and on deposit and the amount of its investments in bonds or obligations of, or guaranteed as to principal and interest by, the United States. No national mortgage association shall borrow money except through the issuance of such notes, bonds, debentures, or other obligations, except with the approval of the Administrator and under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe."

"Sec. 32. Section 32 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, sec. 1016), is further amended by inserting after the second sentence thereof the following new sentence: 'For the purposes of this section, farm property may be valued at an amount representing a prudent investment, consistent with community standards and rentals, if (1) the person occupying the property is not entirely dependent upon farm income for his livelihood but receives a part of his income from other dependable sources, and (2) the farm income from the property, together with earnings from other dependable sources ordinarily available in the community to a person operating such property, would be sufficient to support his family, to pay operating expenses and fixed charges, and to discharge the interest and amortization payments on the loan.'"

And the Senate agree to the same.

CLAIM OF THOMAS F. GARDINER

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, his report and recommendation concerning the claim of Thomas F. Gardiner against the United States, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Nebraska, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to enact into law the Nye-Sweeney bill, Senate File 2162, House Roll 6382

Whereas the Constitution of the United States provides that "the Congress shall have the power to coin money (and) regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin"; and

Whereas this power has been transferred to the large banking interests, thereby enabling them to control the amount of money in circulation through the issuance of banker's credit and currency; and

Whereas this control is unsafe, unsound, and dishonest in that it disappears when needed most; and

Whereas the Nye-Sweeney bill, Senate File No. 2162 and House Roll No. 6382, provides for the replacement of this power in the hands of Congress, where it can be used most effectively to establish and maintain the purchasing power of money at a fixed and equitable level, to increase the prices of agricultural products to a point where they will yield the cost of production plus a fair profit to the farmer; to provide a living and just wage which will enable every citizen willing to work and capable of working to maintain an educate his family on an increasing level or standard of living, to repay debts with dollars of equal value, and to lift in part the burden of taxation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Nebraska in fiftieth regular session assembled:

1. That this house hereby respectfully petitions and memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact into law the Nye-Sweeney bill, Senate File No. 2162 and House Roll No. 6382, providing for the replacement in the hands of Congress of the power to coin all money and regulate the value thereof.

2. That the chief clerk of this house is hereby ordered and directed forthwith to forward a copy of this resolution, properly authenticated and suitably engrossed, to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the United States Senators representing the State of Nebraska and to the Congressmen in the House of Representatives of the United States representing the State of Nebraska, to exercise all power and diligence at their command to the end that the Nye-Sweeney bill, Senate File No. 2162 and House Roll No. 6382, be enacted into law at the present session of the Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following resolutions of the General Court of Massachusetts, which were referred to the Committee on Finance:

Resolutions memorializing Congress for the enactment of Federal legislation to substitute another tax for the discriminatory tax on cigarettes selling at a low price

Whereas the imposition of a Federal tax at the same rate on 10-cent cigarettes is imposed on cigarettes selling at 15 and 20 cents strengthens the power of the Tobacco Trust, known as "the big four", tends toward monopoly, and threatens to eliminate from the market the lower-priced product used by the great majority of consumers, and which is union made under clean and healthful conditions, established by collective bargaining in line with the new deal, so called, and comprising 90 percent of the workers in the industry; and

Whereas the fate of the 10-cent cigarette and of a majority of the workers on, and of small manufacturers of, cigarettes hangs in the balance until this issue is settled: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States is hereby requested to repeal the present unfair and discriminatory tax burden and to impose in lieu of the present tax, levied according to volume, of $3 per thousand cigarettes, or 6 cents per package of 20, regardless of the selling price of the same, a tax of $2.70 per thousand on 10-cent cigarettes, of $3 per thousand on 15-cent cigarettes, and of $3.30 per thousand on higher-priced cigarettes, as provided in pending Federal legislation, the Secretary of the Treasury having recommended such change in tax and having stated that it would protect and maintain Federal revenues; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be forwarded forthwith by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, to the presiding officer of each branch of Congress, and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Massachusetts.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the petition of the National Highway Users Conference, on behalf of numerous national and other organizations, praying that the law providing for Federal excise taxes on gasoline, automobiles, parts, tires, oils, and other products used in motor transportation be not reenacted, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the St. Rose de Lima branch of the Holy Name Society, New Orleans, La., protesting against alleged religious intolerance and persecutions in the Republic of Mexico, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by Hamilton Council, No. 35, Sons and Daughters of Liberty, Brooklyn, N. Y., protesting against the enactment of legislation weakening the present alien-deportation law, and favoring the prompt passage of House bill 5921, to strengthen the existing law pertaining to the deportation of aliens, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also laid before the Senate petitions of sundry citizens of the United States, praying for an investigation of charges filed by the Women's Committee of Louisiana relative to the qualifications of the Senators from Louisiana [Mr. Long and Mr. Overton], which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also laid before the Senate a letter and telegrams in the nature of petitions from several citizens and veterans' organizations of the United States, praying for the enactment of the so-called "Patman bonus bill", which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WALSH presented a resolution adopted by Barbara Frietchie Council, No. 42, Sons and Daughters of Liberty, Cambridge, Mass., protesting against the passage of House bill 6795, the so-called "Kerr bill", relative to the deportation of aliens, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Greenfield and vicinity, in the State of Massachusetts, praying for a rehearing before the Supreme Court of the United States of the case involving the so-called "Railroad Retirement Act", which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COOLIDGE presented a resolution adopted by the Building Trades Council of Boston, Mass., and vicinity, favoring the adoption of labor regulations in connection with work-relief projects so as to include an equal opportunity for employment to so-called "self-sustaining labor", which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a resolution of Aerie No. 448, Fraternal Order of Eagles, of Fitchburg, Mass., favoring the enactment of old-age pension legislation, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition, numerous signed, of sundry citizens, being railroad employees, in the State of Massachusetts, praying for the enactment of legislation extending the effective period of the Emergency Railroad Transportation Act for 1 year, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TYDINGS presented a resolution adopted by officers and directors of the Baltimore (Md.) Association of Credit Men, protesting against the enactment of banking legislation that would materially change the control and operation of the Federal Reserve System, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Poultry Association of Talbot County, Md., favoring the enactment of House bill 5802, providing increased tariff duties on imported egg products, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Fernald, Md., praying for the enactment of the bill (H. R. 2827) to provide for establishment of unemployment, old age, and social insurance, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Fourteen Holy Martyrs Section of the Holy Name Society, of Baltimore, Md., protesting against alleged religious persecutions in the Republic of Mexico and favoring the recall of the American Ambassador to that country, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented resolutions adopted by Independent Council, No. 22, of Mount Washington; Riverdale Council, No. 29, and Pride of Parkville Council, No. 39, all of the Sons and Daughters of Liberty, in the State of Maryland, and Mary-Bell Council, No. 33, Sons and Daughters of Liberty, of Delmar, Del., favoring the enactment of House bill 5921, to strengthen the existing law pertaining to the deportation of aliens, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented the petition of Premier Council, No. 23, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Baltimore, Md., praying for the enactment of legislation to strengthen the existing immigration laws, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition, signed by officers, members, and friends of Liberty Council, No. 16, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Baltimore, Md., praying for the passage of the bill (S. 22) to provide for the deportation of aliens convicted of certain crimes, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Kiwanis Club, of Baltimore, Md., favoring the enactment of pending legislation providing for the return of the frigate Constellation to her original station at Fort McHenry, Md., as a naval museum, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Carroll County, Md., remonstrating against an increase in armaments, and also against the holding of naval maneuvers in the Pacific Ocean, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

EXCISE TAXES ON OILS, GASOLINE, ETC.

Mr. GORE presented the petition of the National Highway Users Conference, on behalf of numerous national and other organizations, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A PETITION TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES AND THE MEMBERS OF THE CONGRESS

The undersigned respectfully present for your consideration the following reasons why it is firmly believed that laws providing for Federal excise taxes on gasoline, automobiles, parts, tires, oils, and other products used in motor transportation should not be reenacted:

1. Motorists of the United States are now subjected to special class taxation (in addition to their general taxes) amounting to approximately one and one-quarter billions of dollars per year.

2. Since each State and the District of Columbia levy special taxes on motorists, special Federal taxation on the same tax-burdened class of citizens clearly constitutes unfair double taxation, and it is an invasion of a field which admittedly should be left to the taxing agencies of the States. This latter point is of grave importance because of the fact that many States have pledged their gasoline-tax revenues to the payment of bond issues.

3. These additional burdens of class taxation on motor transportation are a handicap which is not suffered by any competing forms of transport; and they detract materially from the economy and efficiency which motor transportation has brought to the shipping and consuming public.

4. In the case of the tax on gasoline particularly, the measure of a citizen's contribution to general Federal governmental purposes under this tax is the distance which he is obliged to travel or to transport his products by motor. In the case of the farmer, the measure of his contribution under this tax is the distance he lives from market. Such yardsticks for measuring the amount of an individual's contribution to governmental expenses are so obviously absurd as to need no further comment.

5. Both the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives have expressed themselves in opposition to the continuance of these unfair taxes.

6. The oft-repeated statement that special Federal taxes on motorists are justified as a means of furnishing funds for Federal aid in highway construction is entirely erroneous and unwarranted for the reason that—

a. Federal aid in road building is amply justified as a measure necessary for the national defense of all citizens—not merely the motorists.

b. Federal aid is also necessary to facilitate the distribution of the mails for the benefit of all citizens—not merely the motorists.

c. When the principle of Federal aid was inaugurated it was not the thought of Congress that it should ever be contingent on the imposition of special Federal taxes on highway transportation.

7. The motor industry and allied industries are now successfully leading the way to national recovery. The placing of unjust burdens of taxation directly or indirectly on motorists and the industries purveying the products used in motor transportation is therefore extremely unwise from a standpoint of national recovery.

8. That the unfairness and injustice of these taxes is generally recognized is evidenced by the fact that legislatures of 21 States have memorialized Congress asking that the Federal gasoline tax be allowed to lapse on the expiration date, June 30, 1935; and more than 200 organizations are on record as opposing these taxes. The names of these States and organizations are given in exhibits A and B, respectively, attached hereto.

For these reasons the signatories hereto urge that, in common justice and in the interest of national recovery, no legislation be enacted by the Congress to continue these unfair taxes.

Respectfully submitted.

Mollin, secretary American National Live Stock Association; Fred Brenckman, Washington representative National Grange; E. H. Ever-son, national president Farmers' Union; R. J. PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I have received a telegram from the Kansas State commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, which I desire to place in the RECORD. Before doing so I wish to reiterate my stand in favor of passage of the so-called "Patman bill" providing for immediate cash payment of the veterans' adjusted-service certificates. The measure is a fair measure, a just measure, and I was glad to note in the press that such eminent gentlemen as Mar-riner S. Eccles, Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, and Jesse Jones, Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, are in agreement with the majority of the Senate, and I believe of the country, that the enactment into law of this measure will not harm the credit of the Government of the United States. May I also express the hope that the President will see the wisdom and good judgment of approving the measure?

I send the telegram to the desk and ask that it be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KANSAS CITY, KANS., May 14, 1935.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,

United States Senate:

Business men, professional, 60,000 certificate holders, and Kansans over entire State are definitely for Patman bill. Please read on Senate floor.

C. R. BARNES,

State Commander Veterans Foreign Wars.

Mr. RADCLIFFE. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have printed in the RECORD and lie on the table a telegram addressed to me by James J. McGuirk, commander of the Department of Maryland of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, with reference to the payment of the adjusted-service certificates.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the telegram will lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

The telegram is as follows:

BALTIMORE, Md., May 14, 1935.

Senator GEORGE L. RADCLIFFE:

Every member of the Department of Maryland Veterans of Foreign Wars, numbering 8,000, request that you do everything in your power to have Patman bill adopted. Please read this telegram on Senate Chamber floor Tuesday afternoon, May 14.

JAMES J. MCGUIRK,
Department Commander.

H. J. Res. 249. Joint resolution to provide for participation by the United States in the Eighth International Congress of Military Medicine and Pharmacy to be held at Brussels, Belgium, in June 1935; to the calendar.

AMENDMENT TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL

Mr. STEIWER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6732) authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

SOCIAL SECURITY—AMENDMENTS

Mr. TYDINGS submitted sundry amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 7260) to provide for the general welfare by establishing a system of Federal old-age benefits, and by enabling the several States to make more adequate provision for aged persons, dependent and crippled children, maternal and child welfare, public health, and the administration of their unemployment-compensation laws; to establish a social-security board; to raise revenue; and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

DISPOSITION OF LIGHTHOUSE RESERVATIONS

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, yesterday in my absence, while in attendance at a committee meeting, the Senate passed the bill (H. R. 7131) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to dispose of certain lighthouse reservations, and for other purposes. I regret this action because the Committee on Commerce had instructed me to offer an amendment. I understand the bill has not as yet gone to the other body. Accordingly, I ask unanimous consent to have the amendment considered and acted upon by the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator would first have to ask reconsideration of the votes by which the amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill read a third time and passed.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I should like to have the bill read. I am not familiar with it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I happen to be familiar with the bill. It merely authorizes the disposition of certain properties which are no longer needed or required for use in connection with the Lighthouse Service. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY] is particularly interested in the measure. I see no objection to reconsidering the vote by which the bill was passed in order that the amendment referred to by the Senator from New York may be considered.

Mr. BLACK. I shall not object to reconsideration.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio is not present.

Mr. COPELAND. I am sure the Senator from Ohio would not object.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is my thought that, the committee having instructed the Senator from New York to offer the amendment, the Senator from Ohio would not be interested in opposing the amendment, and therefore I do not suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask unanimous consent that the votes by which the amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time and passed may be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the votes are reconsidered. The bill is before the Senate. The clerk will state the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 18, line 5, before the word "shall", it is proposed to strike out "and 28" and insert "28, and 37."

The amendment was agreed to.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 18, after line 20, it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

Sec. 37. The Secretary of Commerce is authorized to convey to the city of Evanston, Ill., for public-park purposes the Grosse Point Lighthouse Reservation, comprising an area of about 100 feet by 535 feet and appurtenant structures thereon with the exception of the brick light tower and the plot of land surrounding same about 45 feet by 65 feet, together with the rights of ingress and egress, for the purpose of maintaining the light. The deed of conveyance shall describe by metes and bounds the portion of the reservation transferred, and the conditions imposed by section 36 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendment the question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

SOUTH AMERICAN LOANS

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a statement from the American Council of Foreign Bond Holders, Inc., on the subject of South American loans.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN COUNCIL OF FOREIGN BONDHOLDERS, INC.,
New York City, May 11, 1935.

SOUTH AMERICAN LOANS—POSITION AND PROSPECTS

Eight of the ten South American Republics have dollar loans outstanding in the American market, and all eight are in default, in whole or in part. The total outstanding at the beginning of the year, represented by governmental, provincial, and municipal obligations, as well as by bond issues guaranteed by governments or political subdivisions, aggregated $1,365,013,935 out of the original amount of $1,565,419,235, thus indicating that $200,405,000 has been repaid or refunded. Of the amount involved, $535,517,900, or 39.23 percent, of the total outstanding is in complete default; $514,849,800, or 37.72 percent, is in partial default; while $314,646,235 is being serviced in full.

What are the prospects for American investors, institutions, and individuals who have staked well over one and one-third billions in the bonds of their southern neighbors? Will those of the South American debtors who have maintained their service continue to do so, and will those who have been in complete default, because of inability or unwillingness, continue to disregard the rights and privileges of their creditors? To what extent will irregularities and abuses which characterized certain of the South American issues influence the borrowers in question in their plans regarding possible adjustments of their outstanding engagements? These are questions to which holders of the various South American issues or prospective buyers must find an answer before they decide upon the retention of bonds already held or the fresh acquisition of obligations.

At the outset it must be stated that it is erroneous as well as dangerous to generalize about South American loans. There are all types and categories, varying from bonds of investment caliber to those which are highly speculative. In the former group belong the issues of the Argentine Government and those of the city of Buenos Aires, which, while not guaranteed by the Federal Government, enjoy to some extent Government protection.

For more than a generation the service on these bonds has been met promptly and faithfully. In 1932 Argentina almost succumbed, but despite economic as well as political difficulties which confronted the nation, she refused to emulate the example set by her neighbors. The situation in the country has improved appreciably. Trade is heavily in favor. Exchange conditions are decidedly better and further gains are confidently expected as a result of the recently created Central Bank. Argentina's attitude toward bondholders has been adequately rewarded. She was recently enabled to effect some rather important conversion operations which should result in material savings. About a quarter billion dollars are still outstanding in the United States. Most of this debt bears interest at the rate of 6 percent per annum. A conversion into a lower coupon bond appears quite within the realm of probability. The principal impediment to such step is the decidedly unsatisfactory record of most of the country's political subdivisions: Of provincial issues outstanding at eighty-seven and one-half millions, only five and one-half millions is being serviced in full, while of more than twenty-four millions of municipal debts, $13,825,000 is interest and sinking funds. If Argentina is anxious to contract new bonds in the American market, either for refunding purposes or for revenue-producing projects, an adjustment of the provincial or municipal debt, which is either completely or partially in default, appears essential.

Although speculative in character, Brazilian loans, especially those outstanding on behalf of the Federal Government, are distinctly promising at prevailing levels. The country's fiscal record is rather unusual. Brazil has never been guilty of complete cessation of payments. When in difficulties she pays in new bonds. Since 1898 there have been three so-called "funding operations" at intervals of about 17 years. The third took place in 1931. Early last year an arrangement was submitted by the Brazilian Government which an American group (presumably speaking for bondholders) was ready to accept, although the terms were most inequitable and unfair. How easy it is to make sacrifices for the other party! The 1934 debt adjustment provided for the suspension of sinking-fund payments and the reduction in the rate of interest to 35 percent of the amount stipulated for 1935 and 1936, to 40 percent for 1937, and to 50 percent for 1938, when the Government is scheduled to review the situation with a view to making a new and presumably a more equitable arrangement. The outlook is encouraging. Brazil, which has heretofore been a one-product country, the welfare of the Republic depending almost exclusively on coffee, is gradually becoming one of the leading cotton-growing and cotton-exporting countries. While United States planters are being handsomely rewarded for not growing cotton, Brazil is doing all she can to increase the output of what promises to play an increasingly important role in the country's economy.

Bolivian bonds are selling for hardly more than what one might term "souvenir values." The entire debt of nearly fifty-nine and one-half millions is in complete default and threatens to remain in default for some time to come. The pronounced rise in the price of tin, Bolivia's principal standby, has not benefited the nation's creditors, who, by a curious coincidence, are all Americans. Virtually all the income is being consumed by a most senseless war with Paraguay over the so-called "Chaco Boreal", a swampy tract of land said to contain valuable oil fields. Neither Bolivia nor Paraguay is desirous to cease hostilities, but prefer instead to slaughter each other's sons and ruin themselves for decades. How bankers could permit a country like Bolivia to accumulate a debt of sixty millions, which even in normal times appears far beyond the nation's capacity, is difficult to comprehend. American bondholders are now paying the penalty for the mistakes of those who were charged with the guidance of the fiscal destinies of the American people.

Ten years ago an American financial commission left for Chile. An orgy of borrowing or rather lending followed. Within a short time the dollar debt of the Republic trebled. In 1931 Chile's fiscal structure collapsed completely. Nothing has been done on the country's foreign debt since. The other day, or almost exactly 10 years after we went to Chile, presumably to convince her of the desirability of borrowing from us to the limit, the Chileans paid us a return visit. They came to tell us that Chile is prepared to settle her dollar debt on a basis which is equivalent to virtual repudiation. The negotiations are likely to be held with the banking houses which are identified with the origination and distribution of Chilean loans, but which do not own any bonds themselves. Once again sacrifices are expected to be made for or on behalf of bondholders. The indifference of the investor is indeed extraordinary and his patience is that of a saint. Although the situation in Chile still leaves a good deal to be desired, the progress registered in the country is sufficiently marked to warrant the assertion that a more favorable proposal than has been submitted is fully warranted.

Anyone familiar with the past fiscal record of Colombia and the attitude which the Republic has adopted toward its foreign creditors in general and American creditors in particular will agree that obligations of our southern neighbor are not entitled to serious consideration by conservative and discriminating investors. From the speculative point of view, however, Colombian issues may be regarded with reasonable interest, but there would be no justification for acquiring issues of this type unless the yield appears favorable with the return on other foreign issues of at least equal quality.

Despite the fact that the United States absorbs almost 90 percent of Colombia's shipments of coffee abroad, resulting in a very substantial balance of trade in favor of Colombia, all departmental and municipal obligations floated in the United States are in complete default, while interest on Colombian Government issues is payable in 4-percent funding bonds.

Whether the proposed treaty between the United States and Colombia will result, as did a similar treaty with Cuba, in conferring valuable privileges upon our southern neighbor, without receiving consideration in return for such favors, is something that cannot be determined at this moment. However, if American bondholders will enjoy the dubious benefit of that kind of representation which has characterized similar arrangements in the past, one cannot look forward to a revision for the better of Colombia's present debt plan.

To investors in the United States, Ecuador is little more than a name. No bonds sold by its Government are listed on the New York Stock Exchange or Curb, and few brokers now trading "over the counter" have handled "Salt", "Condors", or Guayaquil & Quito Railroad bonds. Yet, strange to say, Ecuador's entire foreign debt, contracted prior to 1927, originated from endorsement by the Government of the obligations of an American corporation. Although all securities issued have their market in London, they are dollar bonds, with the exception of a small loan totaling £76,000.

Outstanding foreign funded debt dates from 1897, when Archer Harman, representative of an American syndicate, contracted to finance and build a railroad from Guayaquil to Quito. The concern was incorporated in the United States of America and sold in London $12,282,000 6-percent bonds, guaranteed by the Ecuadorian Government.

The line was duly built and constitutes a most spectacular feat of engineering, but the railroad company has had a checkered life and has not been able to pay the service on its bonds. This duty has therefore fallen to the lot of the Government, which has not always been equipped to meet the obligation. In order to remove this distressing disability, largely due to an unaccountable disinclination on the part of foreign traders to accept the sucre at its par value in payment for imported goods, the Government resolved to consult the great American wizard economist, who had unloosed streams of American dollars to Colombia, Bolivia, and Chile.

By an interesting and instructive coincidence Professor Kemmerer's prescription of a specific for Ecuador's infirmities was the creation of a bank. This institution was financed by an issue of 10,000,000 sucres ($2,000,000) 8-percent bonds at 88, the service on which was to be paid by Ivar Krueger in exchange for a match monopoly. In 1931 the monopoly was canceled and service of the debt accepted as a Government obligation which is, however, temporarily in default.

Peru's total foreign debt, held almost entirely by American investors, is in complete default. The outlook for an early adjustment is anything but promising. Even if Peru's principal products—cotton, silver, copper, oil, and vanadium—were to advance very materially in price, and even if the advance could be maintained, the service on the nation's engagements is not likely to be resumed in accordance with the terms of original loan agreements. That the investment of capital grew at too rapid a pace is evident from the fact that America's stake in Peru approximated $224,500,000, or almost 6½ times the pre-war figures.

One point in favor of Peru is the fact that the Republic has always endeavored to treat her creditors fairly and even after the disastrous war of the eighties when Chile seized the Department of Tarapaca and with it more than a billion dollars' worth of minerals, the Government readily offered its entire supply of minerals and guano deposits to the bondholders rather than to plead poverty as an excuse for debt repudiation. It was doubtless this commendable sense of responsibility which prompted the Peruvian Government to engage from time to time the service of North American celebrities who might be expected to enjoy friendly relations with bankers in New York from whence emanated such ample supplies of gold credits to the neighboring republics in the course of the twenties.

Political disturbances in Uruguay will doubtless adversely affect quotations of existing Uruguayan loans, notably those outstanding in the American market. Such influence, however, is likely to prove only of a transitory nature, since the Republic is confidently expected to continue the service on dollar debts at least in accordance with the terms at present in force; that is, 3½ percent per annum, regardless of the face amount of coupons. If bonds react to between 30 and 35, they should be regarded as interesting commitments.

Although Uruguay has, on more than one occasion in the past, defaulted in one form or another on its contractual obligations, direct and guaranteed, her credit was held in high esteem for a number of years. This was especially true in the United States, as illustrated by the relative ease with which she obtained financial accommodations in the American market. However, those who were inquisitive enough to study the nation's past fiscal record doubtless discovered that its past performance did not entirely warrant the credit standing it enjoyed. Uruguay's first contact with foreign bankers occurred about 70 years ago. In 1864 an external loan of £1,000,000 was offered at 60, to be used for the conversion of internal obligations.

It is rather curious to find that Uruguay's first loan in the American market synchronized with her default in regard to sinking-fund payments, which apparently did not deter American bankers from calling upon our investing public to take up Uruguayan issues and which may, to some extent, account for the indifference on the part of Uruguay toward her foreign, including American, creditors.

On the 26th of this month the representatives of 21 American Republics will assemble at Buenos Aires in connection with the Pan American Commercial Conference. The economic and commercial relations between the United States and her sister republics are expected to be discussed at length, especially in the light of the recently arranged reciprocal treatments with some of the Latin American Republics and the prospects of similar treaties with the other countries. Whether the fate of the bondholders will be taken into consideration at the session and whether anything concrete will be achieved at the conference cannot be said with any degree of definiteness at this moment. On the basis of precedent, however, it would seem reasonably safe to assume that very little, if anything, that is genuinely concrete will be accomplished. Thus far those guiding Pan American conventions have rarely gone beyond two tangible achievements.

FARMERS' MEETING IN WASHINGTON

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by W. H. Robertson, of Loachapoka, Ala., as chairman of the recent farmers' meeting held at Constitution Hall, in Washington.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Recognizing that this is an unprecedented occasion and that there are undoubtedly many who are wondering who we are and why we are in Washington, it seems proper first of all to say that we are farmers from the Cotton Belt and the Tobacco Belt and from the Wheat Belt and from the Corn Belt, and that this trip is of our own planning. We left the plow handles to come here, and are paying our own way, and are not the pawns of high-powered lobbyists. We have come to Washington because we have the right to come and speak for ourselves and for the great industry we represent, which right we observe is so freely exercised by other groups. Moreover, we came because we felt that we would be welcomed especially by those who are championing the cause of a square deal for the farmer as that cause is represented in the Agricultural Adjustment program. We have come here to approve and to commend that program.

The records show that there is not a community in the Cotton Belt that is not represented in this body. The same holds good for many of the other major crop and livestock producing regions of our country. Every type of producer from tenant to extensive plantation owner is here. Owners of average-sized farms and farmers of average production are in the majority. Those of us who are not paying our way out of our own pockets are having our expenses paid by our fellow farmers whom we personally represent.

This is undoubtedly the first occasion of this kind in history. It probably is the first time in history when a group has visited this city merely for the sake of thanking a great President and his administration for their helpfulness. Particularly do we wish to commend those Congressmen and Senators who have stood so loyally by the program.

As we read the papers and as we canvass history it appears that almost without exception when groups come to Washington they either come to plead for especial privilege or to condemn and denounce, or for all these purposes. We have not a word of denunciation, nor are we seeking special privilege. As indicated, we have come to say "thank you" to the administration in our own name and in our own way. We are here to say that the Agricultural Adjustment program which has done so much to restore economic conditions on the farms of the Nation, to set business going again, and which for the first time in history has actually brought to the farmer something of equality with industry and labor and finance, must be continued. We have come to say that the processing tax and the manner in which it is now used to carry out the various adjustment programs must not be disturbed. The principle underlying the processing tax is exactly the same as that underlying the tariff to which the Nation has been committed for so many generations, and which has exacted tribute in untold millions from agriculture. The processing tax represents the application of the same principle to agriculture that has provided the guaranties that surround labor and capital and that long has been accepted as national policy.

We should like to make plain that we are no more interested in temporary expedients than industry or labor or finance would be. And we resent any suggestion or device that would put agriculture on the relief rolls. Our problem is not a temporary problem nor is it a relief problem. In the past we have had no idea one year what would happen the next. We can't go on like that. We must have a safer and a saner way.

We want a long-time policy. We want it based upon the principle of equality for all and special privilege for none. The present agricultural adjustment program is based upon that principle and for the first time in history, as indicated already, has brought to the farmer, perhaps not all that he is entitled to, but something at least of that to which he in simple justice has a right.

We believe that the security of agriculture is the security of the Nation and that there can be no sustained progress or sustained prosperity that does not have its foundation in a prosperous agricultural people. The system of ruthless exploitation that has ground agriculture down for the past century had to take a turn for better or worse sooner or later, or plunge the Nation into utter chaos. It almost did that by 1932. In the present agricultural program the turn things have taken is the only turn that would lead to the peaceful and constructive rebuilding of the Nation's lost morale and its prostrate economic structure.

At the close of 1932 this Nation had sunk to a level that threatened its very existence. Under the plan for agriculture that was adopted the next year we have seen unprecedented recovery not only in agriculture but generally. Unable to reconcile the violent attacks of the critics with the facts or to judge the possible effect, we are here to gratefully acknowledge the gains that have been made and the tremendous benefits that have come to us all and to say that the gains that have been made must be consolidated and made secure. To that end we pledge our unqualified support. We are here to voice the very emphatic conviction that the instrumentalities that have served us so well must not only be continued unhampered, but must be strengthened and made more effective. Specifically, it is necessary to continue the processing tax; it is necessary that the amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act now pending before Congress be written into law, and as a cotton producer speaking for cotton, we must have the continuance of the Bankhead Cotton Control Act or again face the disasters of overproduction. We think it is also important to say that we are here today to represent American agriculture as a whole, and that we are viewing our problems as a whole. We want each division of American agriculture to receive the consideration to which it is entitled. This is not only in the interests of fairness to all groups alike, but is very definitely in the interest of the national well-being. In this connection and as a final word, I want to say that, first of all, and above all, we are American citizens and believe that the national well-being transcends all things else in importance and that national well-being should be our first concern and is our first concern.

CHAMBER'S BACKERS ON SECRET LIST—EDITORIAL FROM LABOR

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very able editorial from Labor for May 14, 1935, entitled "Chamber's Backers on Secret List."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHAMBER'S BACKERS ON SECRET LIST—BIG NATIONAL PROPAGANDA AGENCY REFUSES TO MAKE PUBLIC NAMES OF THOSE WHO SUPPLY BULK OF ITS FUNDS

Who are the backers of the United States Chamber of Commerce? This organization claims to speak for millions of American business men. It owns and occupies an immense marble palace facing the White House. It spends vast sums on propaganda. It has just publicly challenged every liberal feature of the new-deal program.

In the circumstances, Labor submits, the people have a right to know the individuals and corporations that supply the chamber with the sinews of war. This week a representative of Labor endeavored to secure this information. He didn't succeed, but he did uncover the following extremely interesting facts:

Names of the contributors to the United States Chamber of Commerce are not made public. A list was given out some years ago, but the reaction was so unfavorable that the practice has been abandoned.

The annual report of the chamber's board of directors shows that during the last calendar year the chamber collected $2,108,127 and expended $1,978,141.

Who put up this money? The report says that $89,476 came from organization members, $144,023 from individual members, and $786,617 from associate members. This is a total of $1,020,117 from members.

Another $1,000,000 came from subscriptions and advertising in the chamber's magazine, Nation's Business. Advertising was the big item, and it was furnished by the concerns whose economic policies the chamber champions.

The "organization" members are the local and State chambers of commerce and other business organizations which the United States Chamber is supposed to represent. The "individual" and "associate" members are those whose names and contributions are kept secret. They are described as "persons, firms, and corporations elected by the board of directors of the United States Chamber."

From this secret list the chamber draws more than 90 cents of every dollar of revenue it receives from its members. There is an old adage that "he who pays the fiddler calls the tune."

Of course, those "persons, firms, and corporations" that are on the secret list, and which paid nine-tenths of the membership dues, dictate the policy of the United States Chamber of Commerce.

When the representative of labor suggested that he would like to see the secret list of membership contributors, an official of the chamber replied:

"That is as unreasonable as if we were to ask to be permitted to examine the books of labor."

Of course, the answer is that labor will gladly open its books to the United States Chamber of Commerce or anyone else who desires to examine them. Labor has been in existence for 15 years. During all that time it has never received a dollar which it is ashamed to acknowledge. Labor's supporters are the railroad workers of the United States and Canada. Their names are on our mailing lists. They are not ashamed of labor, and labor is not ashamed of them.

Evidently the United States Chamber of Commerce is ashamed of its principal supporters. If not, why does it refuse to make public their names and the amounts of their contributions?

TAXATION—ADDRESS BY SENATOR LA FOLLETTE

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, on Sunday, April 28, 1935, the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] delivered over the Columbia Broadcasting System an address on the subject of Taxation, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Before this session of Congress adjourns, the vital question of taxation will have to receive consideration. Graduated income, estate, and inheritance taxation is based upon the sound principle that taxes should be levied in accordance with the ability of the taxpayer to carry the burden. Ever since the constitutional amendment was adopted, there has been a sharp conflict in Congress at each session, when a tax bill has been under consideration. On one side have been those who have endeavored to prevent the levying of higher rates of taxation upon large fortunes and big incomes. On the other side have been those who have contended consistently that more and more of the burdens of government should be imposed upon those who are best able to pay.

Opponents of higher income taxes argue that lower rates of taxation produce greater aggregate revenue than the higher rates would yield. They also contend that with the large amount of tax-exempt securities outstanding in this country today, that higher income-tax rates will cause large holders of industrial and other securities to invest in tax-exempt issues.

There are no figures available to prove the contention that high rates of income taxes would produce less aggregate revenue. The figures which opponents use are based upon the experience during the three past Republican administrations when income taxes were decreased. These figures, however, do not take into consideration the much higher level of economic activity prevailing in the boom period. It is interesting to note that if Congress had maintained the rates contained in the 1921 tax bill throughout the period preceding the economic crisis, sufficient revenue would have been raised to have entirely extinguished the public debt.

Insofar as the tax-exempt argument is concerned, I am perfectly willing to admit that until the income derived from these securities is made subject to taxation we shall not have a satisfactory tax system in this country. Nevertheless, I am convinced that the argument concerning tax-exempt securities and their relation to tax yield have been grossly exaggerated. The most recent information that we have on this subject is to be obtained from the report of the Federal Trade Commission in 1924, following the relatively high rates of the war and the immediate post-war period. This report shows that only 3.16 percent of the income of all persons receiving $10,000 a year, or more, was derived from tax-exempt securities.

It is now generally recognized that one of the principal causes of this economic crisis was the failure of mass purchasing power to keep abreast of our increased capacity to produce both agricultural and manufactured products. It is obvious that we cannot employ mass production in industry and scientific methods of agriculture on the farm unless there is an equitable distribution of purchasing power among the people. In 1932 the Taylor Society published a study of purchases by income groups in the year of 1929. This study shows that individuals with incomes of $5,000 or less, purchased approximately 80 percent of all the goods sold in that year, and that those with incomes of $5,000 or more, purchased approximately only 20 percent of all the goods sold.

Until we restore the buying power of that group which in 1929 purchased approximately 80 percent of the goods sold, it is clear that we shall continue to find ourselves in the same or a worse economic situation.

The concentration of wealth in the hands of a relatively small number of people is the inevitable consequence of a maldistribution of our national income. This process has gone on in this country for many generations. The war speeded up the concentration of wealth and it went forward rapidly during the period preceding the economic crisis.

Recognized studies of this problem have been made. Based upon these studies, a simple illustration serves graphically to present the problem with which we must deal. Let us assume that $100 represents the entire vast wealth of this Nation and its people. Let us assume that 100 people represent our entire population. If we divide this $100, representing our total wealth, among these 100 people, representing our total population, as wealth is actually distributed in this country today, we get the following results: 1 person would have $59 out of the hundred; 1 would have $9; 22 people would have $1.22 each, and 76 or all the rest, would have less than 7 cents apiece out of the $100, representing our total wealth.

The tragic suffering and losses of the people during the last few years must teach us that a society such as ours has now become, based upon scientific methods of production on the farm and mass production methods in industry cannot exist very long with the wealth and purchasing power of this country concentrated, as it is today, in the hands of a relatively small proportion of our population.

In order to meet the immediate emergencies of this crisis, it has been necessary for the Federal Government to come to the aid of its citizens, to relieve distress and want and to prevent, in part, human suffering and malnutrition. It has been necessary, likewise, for the Federal Government to provide employment for some of those who are out of work and who cannot find employment in normal business activities. In this session of Congress, an appropriation of $4,880,000,000 has been made to provide work and relief. The announced objectives of this program are to provide employment for those who are employable and who are now upon the relief rolls.

This program does not go far enough because I believe that we can remedy the immediate problems of the crisis only by providing work for all those who cannot secure it in private employment. Nevertheless, it will be conceded, I believe, that the vast expenditures made necessary by the economic crisis cannot be continued unless we are willing to tax more heavily than we have done in the past.

It is clear from the experience of other countries that we cannot carry on these huge expenditures, which are absolutely essential, without taxing to the limit, unless we are willing to embrace the other alternative, which is uncontrolled inflation.

Much has been made of the fact that Great Britain has announced a balanced budget. Reactionaries contend that this example should be followed by the Government of the United States. They fail to emphasize, however, the fact that Great Britain is the only large industrial country in the world which has had the courage to impose drastic income and inheritance taxes to meet the extraordinary expenditures made necessary to relieve human suffering.

It is difficult to make estimates as to the amount of money which would be raised in this country if the British system of taxation were employed in the United States, but one estimate, which I regard as exceedingly conservative, indicates that if we had the courage and the will to impose taxes similar to those that are now in force in Great Britain, we would secure approximately $4,130,000,000 in addition to the revenue which we are now collecting.

If these estimates are correct—and I believe that they are substantially so—it is clear that if we had taxed as heavily in this country as they have done in Great Britain, we would have had a balanced Budget both in 1933 and 1934.

Those who are most anxious to balance our Budget, are often those who protest vociferously against any attempt to increase taxes upon wealth and income, in accordance with ability to pay. The reactionaries, who are arguing that this Government should follow the example of Great Britain and attempt to balance its budget, are in a completely inconsistent position until they are ready to accept the tax burden necessary to accomplish that end.

We are now in possession of information which indicates a substantial increase in profits even during the years of depression. Although pay rolls in December 1934 were only about 60 percent of the total in 1926, dividends and interest were 150 percent of their total in 1926. The Federal Reserve Bank of New York reported the total net profits of 290 industrial and mercantile concerns were $430,500,000 in the first 9 months of 1934, compared with $202,800,000, in the same period in 1933; an increase of 137 percent. The Treasury Department reports that in 1933, the net income of corporations reporting net income was $2,506,000,000, compared with $1,851,000,000 in 1932; an increase of 35.3 percent.

The Government would be fully justified in increasing the taxes upon incomes, estates, and inheritances, because the large expenditures being made by the Government have contributed to the increases in incomes, profits, and dividends. Those who are indirect beneficiaries of the huge expenditures, made necessary by this economic crisis, should be required to carry their full and fair share of the burdens entailed. Only in this way can we carry on these expenditures and avoid uncontrolled inflation. In this way we can secure a more equitable distribution of national income. In this way we can increase the production of wealth, provide employment, and restore morale.

The administration of President Roosevelt has thus far failed to meet the issue of taxation. In the last session they were willing to advocate only legislation designed to plug up the loopholes in the income-tax law which had been revealed by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency. When efforts were made to amend the bill to increase the rates upon incomes, the Treasury refused to take a position. But in the Senate we faced the open opposition of the administration's spokesmen. The attitude of the administration toward taxation at this session has not been revealed. It is to be hoped that it will take a courageous position for heavily increased taxation in accordance with ability to pay. If it fails to meet this issue, it will thereby undermine and ultimately thwart the achievement of its announced objectives. Regardless of the action, or inaction, of the administration, Progressives in Congress will make the best fight of which they are capable to meet the emergency by drastic increases in taxes levied upon wealth and income.

SETTLEMENT OF LABOR DISPUTES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1958) to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, to diminish the causes of labor disputes, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I inquire if consent was granted first to consider committee amendments?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There was a unanimous-consent agreement entered yesterday that the committee amendments should first be considered; and the first committee amendment inserting in line 3, page 1, the words "Findings and" in the caption was stated. The question is on agreeing to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will continue the statement of the committee amendments.

The next amendment of the Committee on Education and Labor was, on page 1, after line 3, to strike out:

SECTION 1. Equality of bargaining power between employers and employees is not attained when the organization of employers in the corporate and other forms of ownership association is not balanced by the free exercise by employees of the right to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing. Experience has proved that in the absence of such equality the resultant failure to maintain equilibrium between the rate of wages and the rate of industrial expansion impairs economic stability and aggravates recurrent depressions, with consequent detriment to the general welfare and to the free flow of commerce. Denials of the right to bargain collectively lead also to strikes and other manifestations of economic strife, which create further obstacles to the free flow of commerce.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SECTION 1. The inequality of bargaining power between employer and individual employees which arises out of the organization of employers in corporate forms of ownership and out of numerous other modern industrial conditions impairs and affects commerce by creating variations and instability in wage rates and working conditions within and between industries and by depressing the purchasing power of wage earners in industry, thus increasing the disparity between production and consumption, reducing the amount of commerce, and tending to produce and aggravate recurrent business depressions. The protection of the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively tends to restore equality of bargaining power and thereby fosters, protects, and promotes commerce among the several States.

The denial by employers of the right of employees to organize and the refusal by employers to accept the procedure of collective bargaining leads to strikes and other forms of industrial unrest which burden and affect commerce. Protection by law of the right to organize and bargain collectively removes this source of industrial unrest and encourages practices fundamental to the friendly adjustment of industrial strife.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Definitions", on page 4, line 2, after the word "organization", to insert "(other than when acting as employer)", so as to read:

Sec. 2. When used in this act—

(1) The term "person" includes one or more individuals, partnerships, associations, corporations, legal representatives, trustees, trustees in bankruptcy, or receivers.

(2) The term "employer" includes any person acting in the interest of an employer, directly or indirectly, but shall not include the United States, or any State or political subdivision thereof, or any person subject to the Railway Labor Act, as amended from time to time, or any labor organization (other than when acting as an employer), or anyone acting in the capacity of officer or agent of such labor organization.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 23, before the word "hours", to strike out "or", and in the same line, after the word "employment", to insert a comma and "or conditions of work", so as to read:

(5) The term "labor organization" means any organization of any kind, or any agency or employee representation committee or plan, in which employees participate and which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours of employment, or conditions of work.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 1, after the word "trade" and the comma, to insert "traffic", so as to read:

(6) The term "commerce" means trade, traffic, or commerce, or any transportation or communication relating thereto, among the several States, or between the District of Columbia or any Territory of the United States and any State or other Territory, or between any foreign country and any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or within the District of Columbia or any Territory, or between points in the same State but through any other State or any Territory or the District of Columbia or any foreign country.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 5, after the words "Executive Order", to insert "No. 6763", so as to read:

(11) The term "old Board" means the National Labor Relations Board established by Executive Order No. 6763 of the President on June 29, 1934, pursuant to Public Resolution No. 44, approved June 19, 1934 (48 Stat. 1183).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 3, to insert:

(c) The Board shall at the close of each fiscal year make a report in writing to Congress and to the President stating in detail the cases it has heard, the decisions it has rendered, the names, salaries, and duties of all employees and officers in the employ or under the supervision of the Board, and an account of all moneys it has disbursed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 13, after the word "appoint", to strike out "such employees, and"; in line 15, after the word "laws", to strike out "or" and insert "but subject to"; in line 16, after the word "amended" and the comma, to strike out "appoint and fix the compensation of"; in line 17, after the words "executive secretary", to strike out "assistant executive secretaries"; in line 18, after the word "attorneys" and the comma, to strike out "special experts"; in line 19, after the word "directors" and the comma, to insert "and shall appoint such other employees with regard to existing laws applicable to the employment and compensation of officers and employees of the United States," and on page 8, line 2, after the word "needed" and the period, to insert "attorneys appointed under this section may, at the direction of the Board, appear for and represent the Board in any case in court. Nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize the Board to appoint individuals for the purpose of conciliation or mediation (or for statistical work), where such service may be obtained from the Department of Labor."

So as to read:

SEC. 4. (a) Each member of the Board shall receive a salary of $10,000 a year, shall be eligible for reappointment, and shall not engage in any other business, vocation, or employment. The Board shall appoint, without regard for the provisions of the civil-service laws but subject to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, an executive secretary, and such attorneys, examiners, and regional directors, and shall appoint such other employees with regard to existing laws applicable to the employment and compensation of officers and employees of the United States, as it may from time to time find necessary for the proper performance of its duties and as may be from time to time appropriated for by Congress. The Board may establish or utilize such regional, local, or other agencies, and utilize such voluntary and uncompensated services, as may from time to time be needed. Attorneys appointed under this section may, at the direction of the Board, appear for and represent the Board in any case in court. Nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize the Board to appoint individuals for the purpose of conciliation or mediation (or for statistical work), where such service may be obtained from the Department of Labor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 20, after the word "Board", to strike out "at their present grades and salaries" and insert "with salaries under the Classification Act of 1923, as amended", so as to read:

(b) Upon the appointment of the three original members of the Board and the designation of its chairman, the old Board shall cease to exist; and all pending investigations and proceedings of the old Board, and all proceedings in the courts pursuant to Public Resolution No. 44, approved June 19, 1934 (48 Stat. 1183), to which the old Board is a party, shall be continued by the Board in its discretion. All orders made by the old Board pursuant to said Public Resolution No. 44 shall continue in effect unless modified, superseded, or revoked by the Board after due notice and hearing. All employees of the old Board shall be transferred to and become employees of the Board, with salaries under the Classification Act of 1933, as amended, without acquiring by such transfer a permanent or civil-service status. All records, papers, and property of the old Board shall become records, papers, and property of the Board, and all unexpended funds and appropriations for the use and maintenance of the old Board shall become funds and appropriations available to be expended by the Board in the exercise of the powers, authority, and duties conferred on it by this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, after line 23, to strike out:

(b) The Board shall have authority and is directed to study the activities of such boards and agencies as have been or may be hereafter established by agreement, code, or law to deal with labor disputes, and to receive from such boards reports of their activities.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Rights of Employees", on page 11, line 9, after the words "representatives of the", to strike out "majority of the"; and in line 9, after the word "employees", to insert "as provided in section 9 (a)", so as to read:

SEC. 7. Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities, for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

SEC. 8. It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—
(1) To interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7.

(2) To dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of any labor organization or contribute financial or other support to it: Provided, That subject to rules and regulations made and published by the Board pursuant to section 6 (a), an employer shall not be prohibited from permitting employees to confer with him during working hours without loss of time or pay.

(3) By discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization: Provided, That nothing in this act, or in the National Industrial Recovery Act (U. S. C., title 15, secs. 701-712), as amended from time to time, or in any code or agreement approved or prescribed thereunder, or in any other statute of the United States, shall preclude an employer from making an agreement with a labor organization (not established, maintained, or assisted by any action defined in this act as an unfair labor practice) to require as a condition of employment membership therein, if such labor organization is the representative of the employees as provided in section 9 (a), in the appropriate collective-bargaining unit covered by such agreement when made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 15, to insert:

(5) To refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees, subject to the provisions of section 9 (a).

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, at this point I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question. I ask the question of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] because I know he is familiar with it and I want to get his philosophy on the matter.

On page 11, I ask if he individually would have any objection to an amendment being inserted between lines 15 and 16 to read as follows:

4. It shall be an unfair labor practice for any person (a) to coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7; (b) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in their rights to work and to join or not to join any labor organization.

That amendment is proposed to be inserted on page 11, as a new provision, between lines 15 and 16.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I should seriously object to it. An amendment like that was considered by the committee. At this moment, while we are considering only committee amendments, I should seriously object to the inclusion of any such amendment as that proposed by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I desire to state that the amendment I have just read springs from this sort of situation. There are in one plant alone in Maryland about 12,000 men who belong to a company union. Their representatives have been to see me several times. They purport to speak for at least the overwhelming majority of the men working in that plant. They have no objection to the establishment of the principle of collective bargaining, but they say that if they have their own organization and it is satisfactory to them, they should be allowed to keep it and that it should not be legislated out of existence. My amendment seeks to give them the right to have the kind of organization they want and not be coerced into having the kind of organization they do not want.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if there is anything in the bill which has the effect of which the Senator from Maryland now speaks, I have not been able to discover it.

Mr. TYDINGS. If I understood the remarks of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] yesterday, though I do not know just where they apply in the bill, he spoke about outlawing, in effect, the company unions.

Mr. WAGNER. No; a company-dominated union.

Mr. BORAH. There is nothing in the bill to prevent a company union if the working men want a company union.

Mr. WAGNER. That is exactly what I said in several places in my address yesterday.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I read my amendment to the Senator from Idaho? I cannot see why there should be any objection to the amendment, which reads as follows:

It shall be an unfair labor practice for any person (a) to coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7—

Mr. BORAH. I am not clear, hearing it read in the first instance, that there is any objection to it, but I certainly should not want it offered on the theory which has been suggested, that there is anything in the bill which makes it necessary. We are here dealing with the relation between employer and employee. If we take up the matter of legislating between employees as perhaps we should, then we shall have to make far more machinery than the amendments provide. That is the only objection I see to placing it in this bill. It introduces a wholly new field of legislation.

Mr. TYDINGS. I want to make my position clear. I have no objection at all to the principle of collective bargaining, but I take the position that men ought not to be coerced to join any organization which they do not want to join.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly not.

Mr. TYDINGS. It is just as important to save their rights to them as it is to give others the right of collective bargaining. What the amendment would do would be to make illegal the coercion of any group of men who were satisfied with their present condition.

Mr. BORAH. It has been stated over and over again by the critics of the bill that the bill prohibits the company union. There is nothing in the bill which prohibits a group of men coming together and organizing a company union if they themselves, the workers, desire a company union. The intention is to prevent companies from dominating and controlling a union in making the organization. I want to see the workman free to join a union or to remain out of a union. I want working men free to form any kind of a union if it is freely formed; that is, formed of the free will of the employees. This bill does not do what so many seem to think.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is not the subject to which I am addressing myself. I am assuming as accurate the information which has been conveyed to me, that these men have a fear that they will be coerced into joining a union which they might not want to join. Whether it is right for them to join that union or not right for them to join that union, I am not discussing. My whole interest is to preserve for them the right to belong to the kind of union they want. If it is a company union all well and good. If it is not a company union, and is some other kind of a union, all well and good. I am not arguing whether one union or another is better for them. I am interested in preserving for them their American rights to join whatever union they think is best suited to their needs.

Mr. BORAH. If the bill does not do that then the bill ought not to be considered at all.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then there ought not to be any objection to my amendment, because it simply provides that they shall not be coerced into joining any kind of union that they themselves do not want to join.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand the matter, the bill is designed to give absolute freedom to American workingmen—

Mr. TYDINGS. That is what I want.

Mr. BORAH. The right to have a union or not to have a union, to be out of a union or in a union, to be in an organized labor union or in a company union, as the workingmen themselves shall determine. The only point is to prevent someone else from dominating and controlling them at all.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am just as anxious that the employees shall not dominate and control as is the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. I am just as interested that nobody else shall coerce or dominate or control them against their will as is anyone else.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, let us proceed with the committee amendments.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I inquire if the Senator from Maryland has formally offered his amendment?

Mr. TYDINGS. I intended to propose it, but in view of the fact that committee amendments are now being considered I shall not detain the Senate further at this time. We were on the question at the moment, and I merely wanted to get the view of the Senator from New York.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Labor and Education was, under the heading, "Representatives and elections", on page 12, line 3, after the word "employer", to strike out "through representatives of their own choosing", so as to read:

SEC. 9. (a) Representatives designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment: Provided, That any individual employee or a group of employees shall have the right at any time to present grievances to their employer.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 19, after the numerals "10", to strike out "(d)" and insert "(c)"; at the beginning of line 25, after the numerals "10", to strike out "(f)" and insert "(e)", and in the same line, after "or 10", to strike out "(g)" and insert "(f)", so as to read:

(d) Whenever an order of the Board made pursuant to section 10 (c) is based in whole or in part upon facts certified following an investigation pursuant to subsection (c) of this section, and there is a petition for the enforcement or review of such order, such certification and the record of such investigation shall be included in the transcript of the entire record required to be filed under subsections 10 (e) of 10 (f), and thereupon the decree of the court enforcing, modifying, or setting aside in whole or in part the order of the Board shall be made and entered upon the pleadings, testimony, and proceedings set forth in such transcript.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Prevention of unfair labor practices", on page 13, line 12, after the word "otherwise", to strike out the comma and "except as provided in section 11", so as to read:

SEC. 10. (a) The Board is empowered, as hereinafter provided, to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice (listed in sec. 8) affecting commerce. This power shall be exclusive, and shall not be affected by any other means of adjustment or prevention that has been or may be established by agreement, code, law, or otherwise.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 12, to strike out:

(b) The Board may, in its discretion, defer its exercise of jurisdiction over any such unfair practice in any case where there is another means of prevention provided for by agreement, code, law, or otherwise, which has not been utilized. But in any case where the Board has so deferred, the Board may at any time thereafter institute proceedings under this act in order to assure the effectuation of the policy of this act and the development of a uniform body of administrative interpretation and practice with respect to unfair labor practices as defined herein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 23, to strike out "(c) Whenever there is a charge or the Board shall have reason to believe" and insert "(b) Whenever it is charged"; on page 14, line 6, before the word "days", to strike out "three" and insert "five"; in line 12, after the word "answer", to insert "to the original or amended complaint"; and in the same line, after the word "complaint", to strike out the comma and "and to invoke the compulsory process of the Board in summoning witnesses in its behalf", so as to read:

(b) Whenever it is charged that any person has engaged in or is engaging in any such unfair labor practice, the Board, or any agent or agency designated by the Board for such purposes, shall have power to issue and cause to be served upon such person a complaint stating the charges in that respect, and containing a notice of hearing before the Board or a member thereof, or before a designated agent or agency, at a place therein fixed, not less than 5 days after the serving of said complaint. Any such complaint may be amended by the member, agent, or agency conducting the hearing or the Board in its discretion at any time prior to the issuance of an order based thereon. The person so complained of shall have the right to file an answer to the original or amended complaint and to appear in person or otherwise and give testimony at the place and time fixed in the complaint. In the discretion of the member, agent, or agency conducting the hearing, or the Board, any other person may be allowed to appear in the said proceeding to present testimony. In any such proceeding the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity shall not be controlling.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 21, before the word "The", to strike out "(d)" and insert "(c)"; in line 23, after the word "Board", to insert "upon notice"; on page 15, line 6, after the word "including", to strike out "restitution" and insert "reinstatement of employees with or without back pay", and in line 15, after the words "order", to strike out "dissolving" and insert "dismissing", so as to read:

(c) The testimony taken by such member, agent or agency or the Board shall be reduced to writing and filed with the Board. Thereafter, in its discretion, the Board upon notice may take further testimony or hear argument. If upon all the testimony taken the Board shall be of the opinion that any person named in the complaint has engaged in or is engaging in any such unfair labor practice, then the Board shall state its findings of fact and shall issue and cause to be served on such person an order requiring such person to cease and desist from such unfair labor practice, and to take such affirmative action, including reinstatement of employees with or without back pay, as will effectuate the policies of this act. Such order may further require such person to make reports from time to time showing the extent to which it has complied with the order. If upon all the testimony taken the Board shall be of the opinion that no person named in the complaint has engaged in or is engaging in any such unfair labor practice, then the Board shall state its findings of fact and shall issue an order dismissing the said complaint.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after line 20, to strike out: "(f) If such person fails or neglects to obey such order of the Board while the same is in effect, the Board may petition any circuit court of appeals of the United States within any circuit wherein the unfair labor practice in question occurred or wherein such person resides or transacts business, or the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia", and insert: "(e) If such person fails or neglects to obey such order of the Board while the same is in effect, the Board may petition any circuit court of appeals of the United States (including the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia), or if all the circuit courts of appeals to which application may be made are in vacation, any district court of the United States (including the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia), within any circuit or district, respectively, wherein the unfair labor practice in question occurred or wherein such person resides or transacts business", and on page 17, line 21, after the word "review", to insert "by the appropriate circuit court of appeals if application was made to the district court as hereinabove provided, and", so as to read:

(e) If such person fails or neglects to obey such order of the Board while the same is in effect, the Board may petition any circuit court of appeals of the United States (including the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia), or if all the circuit courts of appeals to which application may be made are in vacation, any district court of the United States (including the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia), within any circuit or district, respectively, wherein the unfair labor practice in question occurred or wherein such person resides or transacts business, for the enforcement of such order and for appropriate temporary relief or restraining order, and shall certify and file in the court a transcript of the entire record in the proceeding, including the pleadings and testimony upon which such order was entered and the findings and order of the Board. Upon such filing, the court shall cause notice thereof to be served upon such person, and thereupon shall have jurisdiction of the proceeding and of the question determined therein, and shall have power to grant such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper, and shall make and enter upon the pleadings, testimony, and proceedings set forth in such transcript a decree enforcing, modifying, or setting aside in whole or in part the order of the Board. No objection that has not been urged before the Board, its member, agent, or agency, shall be considered by the court, unless the failure or neglect to urge such objection shall be excused because of extraordinary circumstances. The findings of the Board as to the facts, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive. If either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the hearing before the Board, its member, agent, or agency, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the Board, its member, agent, or agency, and to be made a part of the transcript. The Board may modify its findings as to the facts, or make new findings, by reason of additional evidence so taken and filed, and it shall file such modified or new findings, which, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive, and shall file its recommendations, if any, for the modification or setting aside of its original order. The jurisdiction of the court shall be exclusive, and its judgment and decree shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the appropriate circuit court of appeals if application was made to the district court as hereinabove provided, and by the Supreme Court of the United States upon writ of certiorari or certification as provided in sections 239 and 240 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U. S. C., title 28, secs. 346 and 347).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, at the beginning of line 3, before the word "Any", to strike out "(g)" and insert "(f)"; in the same line, after the word "by", to strike out "an" and insert "a final"; and in line 19, after the word "subsection", to strike out "(f)" and insert "(e)", so as to read:

(f) Any person aggrieved by a final order of the Board granting or denying in whole or in part the relief sought may obtain a review of such order in any circuit court of appeals of the United States in the circuit wherein the unfair labor practice in question was alleged to have been engaged in or wherein such person resides or transacts business, or in the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, by filing in such court a written petition praying that the order of the Board be modified or set aside. A copy of such petition shall be forthwith served upon the Board, and thereupon the aggrieved party shall file in the court a transcript of the entire record in the proceeding, certified by the Board, including the pleading and testimony upon which the order complained of was entered and the findings and order of the Board. Upon such filing, the court shall proceed in the same manner as in the case of an application by the Board under subsection (e), and shall have the same exclusive jurisdiction to grant to the Board such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper, and shall in like manner make and enter a decree enforcing, modifying, or setting aside, in whole or in part, the order of the Board; and the findings of the Board as to the facts, if supported by evidence, shall in like manner be conclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, at the beginning of line 1, before the word "The", to strike out "(h)" and insert "(g)"; and in line 2, after the word "section" where it occurs the first time, to strike out "(f) or (g)" and insert "(e) or (f)", so as to read:

(g) The commencement of proceedings under subsection (e) or (f) of this section shall not, unless specifically ordered by the court, operate as a stay of the Board's order.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, at the beginning of line 5, before the word "When", to strike out "(i)" and insert "(h)"; and in line 6, before the word "restraining", to insert the article "a", so as to read:

(h) When granting appropriate temporary relief or a restraining order, or making and entering a decree enforcing, modifying, or setting aside, in whole or in part, an order of the Board, as provided in this section, the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity shall not be limited by the act entitled "An act to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes" (U. S. C., title 29, secs. 101-115).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, at the beginning of line 13, before the word "petitions", to strike out "(j)" and insert "(i)", so as to read:

(i) Petitions filed under this act shall be heard expeditiously, and if possible within 10 days after they have been docketed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, after line 15, to strike out:

Sec. 11. The several district courts of the United States are hereby invested with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain any unfair labor practice affecting commerce; and it shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States, in their respective districts, under the direction of the Attorney General, but solely at the request of the National Labor Relations Board, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain any such unfair labor practice, in the judicial district wherein such unfair labor practice occurred or wherein the person complained of resides or transacts business. Such proceedings may be by way of petition setting forth the case and praying that such violation be enjoined and that such affirmative action, including restitution, be required as will effectuate the policies of this act. When such person shall have been duly notified of such petition the court shall proceed, as soon as may be, to the hearings and determination of the case; and pending such petition and before final decree, the court may at any time make such temporary restraining order or prohibition as shall be deemed just in the premises.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, after line 10, to strike out:

ARBITRATION

Sec. 12. (a) The Board shall have power to act and to appoint any person, agent, or agency to act as arbitrator in labor disputes, when parties agree to submit the whole or any part of a labor dispute to the arbitration of the Board or its appointees. A provision in a written contract or a written agreement to submit to the arbitration of the Board or its appointees, when accepted by the Board after the dispute has arisen, shall be valid and irrevocable as to the parties to the agreement, save upon such grounds as exist at law or in equity for the revocation of any contract. If any party fails, neglects, or refuses to perform under such contract or submission, the Board, its agents or appointees, may nevertheless, in the discretion of the Board, proceed to hear the case ex parte, and the Board, its agents or appointees, shall have the power to issue an award applicable to the submitting parties.

(b) The Board shall make and publish, pursuant to section 6 (a), rules for the conduct of arbitrations, and an agreement to submit to the arbitration of the Board, or its appointees or its agents, shall be deemed consent to the proceeding being conducted in accordance with such rules then obtaining unless otherwise specified in the arbitration contract or submission. An agreement to submit to the Board shall authorize the Board to appoint agents to take evidence, and in the discretion of the Board, to render a decision in the name of the Board on the findings thus presented, unless otherwise specified in the agreement. The Board may, however, in its discretion, render a decision on testimony taken before its agents.

(c) In any case in which an award has been made, the Board shall file the award in the clerk's office of the United States District Court that has been agreed upon by the parties, or, in default of such agreement, that of the district wherein the labor dispute arose or the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Notice of the filing shall be personally served or sent by registered mail to each submitting party. Unless a petition to impeach the award on the grounds hereinafter set forth shall be filed in the clerk's office of the court in which the award has been filed, the court shall enter judgment in accordance with the terms of the award: Provided, That no employee individually, and no group of employees collectively, shall be compelled to render labor or services without their consent.

(d) A petition for the impeachment of any award may be filed not more than 10 days after the communication of notice of the filing of the award to the submitting parties. Notice of filing of such petition shall be served personally or sent by registered mail to each submitting party. The petition shall be sustained by the court only on one or more of the following grounds:

1. That the proceedings were not substantially in conformity with the provisions of the arbitration agreement or rules adopted for the conduct of the arbitration.

2. That an arbitrator or member of the Board participating in the award was guilty of fraud or corruption; or that a party to the award practiced fraud or corruption which affected the result; Provided, That partisanship known, or which by the exercise of due care should have been known, by a party prior to the arbitration proceeding, shall not constitute fraud of which he may avail himself within the meaning of this section.

(e) The court shall not set aside an award on the ground that it is invalid for uncertainty. In such case the court shall suspend action pending its resubmission of said award to the Board for interpretation.

(f) Where there was an evident material miscalculation of figures, or an evident material mistake in the description of any person, thing, or property referred to in the award, or where the arbitrators have awarded on a matter not submitted to them, unless it is a matter affecting the merits of the decision on the matters submitted or where the award is imperfect in the matter of form not affecting the matter of the controversy, the court shall modify and correct the award so as to effect the intent thereof and promote justice between the parties, and thereupon shall enter judgment in accordance with subsection (a).

(g) The court shall construe every award with a view to favoring its validity. If the court shall determine that a part of the award is invalid on some ground or grounds designated in this section as a ground of invalidity, but that a part of the award is valid, the court shall nevertheless enter judgment upon such part or parts of the award as are valid unless such part or parts are inseparable from the remainder of the award, in which case the entire award shall be vacated.

(h) If the petition for impeachment of the award is not sustained, the court shall enter judgment in accordance with the terms of the award, and in accordance with subsection (c). Where a petition for the impeachment of an award is granted, the award shall be vacated, and the court shall remand the arbitration to the Board, which may, in its discretion, accept the case for resubmission to arbitration in accordance with the terms of the original agreement or with such modification as the Board deems fit, or it may refuse to take any further action regarding it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Investigatory powers", on page 24, line 12, after "sec.", to strike out "13" and insert "11", and in line 15, after the word "by", to strike out "section 9, section 10, and section 12 (in any arbitration affecting commerce)" and insert "section 9 and section 10", so as to read:

SEC. 11. For the purpose of all hearings and investigations, which, in the opinion of the Board, are necessary and proper for the exercise of the powers vested in it by section 9 and section 10—

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 12, after the word "possession", to insert "or the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia"; and in line 16, after the word "business", to strike out "and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia," so as to read:

(2) In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpoena issued to any person, any District Court of the United States or the United States courts of any Territory or possession, or the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, within the jurisdiction of which the inquiry is carried on or within the jurisdiction of which said person guilty of contumacy or refusal to obey is found or resides or transacts business, upon application by the Board shall have jurisdiction to issue to such person an order requiring such person to appear before the Board, its member, agent, or agency, there to produce evidence if so ordered, or there to give testimony touching the matter under investigation or in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by said court as a contempt thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 12, after "Sec.", to strike out "14" and insert "12", and in the same line, after the word "willfully", to strike out "assault," so as to read:

SEC. 12. Any person who shall willfully resist, prevent, impede, or interfere with any member of the Board or any of its agents or agencies in the performance of duties pursuant to this act shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 19, after "Sec.", to strike out "15" and insert "13", so as to read:

SEC. 13. Nothing in this act shall be construed so as to interfere with or impede or diminish in any way the right to strike.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 22, after "Sec.", to strike out "16" and insert "14"; and on page 28, line 11, after the word "shall", to strike out "apply" and insert "remain in full force and effect", so as to read:

SEC. 14. Wherever the application of the provisions of section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act (U. S. C., title 15, sec. 707 (a)), as amended from time to time, or of section 77 (b), paragraphs (l) and (m) of the act approved June 7, 1934, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States', approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto" (48 Stat. 922, pars. (l) and (m)), as amended from time to time or of Public Resolution No. 44, approved June 19, 1934 (48 Stat. 1183), conflicts with the application of the provisions of this act, this act shall prevail: Provided, That in any situation where the provisions of this act cannot be validly enforced, the provisions of such other acts shall remain in full force and effect.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 12, after "Sec.", to strike out "17" and insert "15", so as to read:

SEC. 15. If any provision of this act, or the application of such provision to any person or circumstance, shall be held invalid, the remainder of this act, or the application of such provision to persons or circumstances other than those as to which it is held invalid, shall not be affected thereby.

The amendment was agreed to.

LXXIX—482

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 17, after "Sec.", to strike out "18" and insert "16", so as to read:

SEC. 16. This act may be cited as the "National Labor Relations Act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That completes the committee amendments.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I have two amendments which I desire to offer. The first amendment is, on page 10, line 10, after the word "protection", to insert "free from coercion or intimidation from any source."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 10, line 10, after the word "protection", it is proposed to insert:

Free from coercion or intimidation from any source.

Mr. TYDINGS. So that the whole section will then read as follows:

RIGHTS OF EMPLOYEES

SEC. 7. Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities, for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, free from coercion or intimidation from any source.

Is there any objection to that amendment?

Mr. WAGNER. There certainly is.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, does the Senator propose that as a new subdivision (5) on page 11?

Mr. TYDINGS. No; that is the next amendment. The two amendments seek to accomplish the same purpose. I cannot see why employees should not be allowed to bargain collectively without coercion or intimidation from any source whatsoever.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I understand the concern which the Senator from Maryland has for the particular representative plan which he has in mind. As was developed at the hearings before the committee—

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President—

Mr. WAGNER. Let me finish, please, because I know the plan of which the Senator speaks. It is a so-called "company union" plan, and my own opinion is that it is a company-dominated union, for the employer finances it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let us assume that it is.

Mr. WAGNER. Very well.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is not the question at issue here.

Mr. WAGNER. Just one minute. Besides prohibiting the financing of such a union, the bill gives the workers absolute freedom to select representatives of their own choosing, and the way it is done is this—

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; but if the Senator will permit me—

Mr. WAGNER. I should like to finish.

Mr. TYDINGS. But the Senator is proceeding on a wrong premise. I leave out all consideration of any particular union, a company union, or any other kind of union. All this amendment seeks is the right of the men themselves to have whatever kind of union they want, without coercion or intimidation by anybody.

Mr. WAGNER. Exactly; and that is what they are given under—

Mr. TYDINGS. Does the Senator want them coerced or intimidated?

Mr. WAGNER. There is a difference between using the word "coercion" as between employees and using it as between an employer and an employee. The elections which are provided for in this bill will be conducted under Government supervision.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not interfere with that.

Mr. WAGNER. And each person who votes will choose the organization which he wishes to have represent him, or decide not to be represented by any organization.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I did not use it as between employee and employee. I said that no person should interfere with the right of the employee to select his own organization.

Mr. WAGNER. The amendment which the Senator suggests is not new to me. If I had been willing to accept that amendment, all the large employers who are trying to prevent their workers from organizing would have accepted this bill, because the amendment is exactly what they want.

So far as coercion is concerned, if it exists among employees, there is now an absolute legal right to go into court and seek an injunction if such coercion takes the form of intimidation or violence of any kind or character. When I was a judge I issued such injunctions myself. But how has the word "coercion" as among employees been interpreted by the courts? The use of pickets, mere persuasion without any force, threats, or intimidation, has been deemed coercion; and employees simply trying to persuade their fellow workers to join a particular organization have been charged with coercion.

This question came up when the Railway Labor Act was before the Interstate Commerce Committee. The railroad companies, which still had company-dominated unions, desired to have an amendment similar to that of the Senator from Maryland placed in the act. As I recall, the committee rejected that proposal by a unanimous vote. Mr. Eastman appeared before the committee and testified upon that question, and for the enlightenment of the Senate I should like to read from his testimony.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is really speaking in my time. He has not yet given me a chance to complete my statement.

Mr. WAGNER. I thought I had the floor.

Mr. TYDINGS. I did not so understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland has the floor.

Mr. WAGNER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am ready to answer any questions, but I do not want the Senator to cry down my amendment at least before I state my own position.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator asked me if I objected to the amendment, and I was trying to answer his question. That could not be done in a word.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, let me again read section 7 as it would stand with this amendment. I think we are discussing something which is not before the Senate. Here is the way it would read:

RIGHTS OF EMPLOYEES

SEC. 7. Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities, for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection—free from coercion or intimidation from any source.

Then I add—

If we are going to give the employees this right, why should they not be allowed to exercise it, not only without coercion from those who employ them but without coercion from those who may not employ them? Is not this still a country where a man can select, without coercion or intimidation, the kind of organization to which he shall belong? If this bill is fair, if it attempts to give to those who toil the right to work out their own destiny, then it is wrong not to say they shall not be coerced or intimidated in regard to joining whatever organization they think will give them the opportunity to secure a chance to work under the best conditions.

What harm can there be in saying that the employees shall have this right without coercion or intimidation from any person, employer, or anyone else whatsoever?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President—

Mr. TYDINGS. I will yield to the Senator from Michigan in just a minute.

Or do we mean, by inference, in speaking against this amendment, that the employees shall be subjected to certain coercion or intimidation from some other source, although the employer shall not intimidate or coerce them?

I now yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, of course the Senator from Maryland knows, as does the Senator from New York—and that is the reason why I am astonished by the objection of the Senator from New York to this amendment—that in every big industrial community there is competition between one union and another. There is just as much fight, there is just as much effort, there is just as much salesmanship, there is just as much force used in many cases to induce workmen to join one union as to join another. For the life of me I do not understand why a union should be enabled to coerce a worker into an organization which he does not choose to join.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WAGNER. Such acts are today illegal and remediable if they amount to threats or intimidation or force of any kind or character. Application may be made to a court for an injunction, and injunctions are issued by the thousands by courts all over the country to prevent such action. There is no remedy today, however, when an employer uses his economic pressure to compel a worker to join a particular organization or not to join a particular organization. There has been no enforcement power anywhere to prevent that type of economic coercion.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator from New York insists on confusing the issue.

Mr. WAGNER. I think the Senator from Michigan is confusing the issue.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator from Maryland yielded to me, and I was not discussing coercion on the part of the employer.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I have yielded first to the Senator from Michigan. When he finishes, I will yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator from New York injected that matter into the issue to confuse it. The Senator from Michigan is not in any way attempting to weaken the bill of the Senator from New York with respect to the coercion of the employer.

Mr. TYDINGS. Neither am I.

Mr. COUZENS. What the Senator from Michigan is trying to do is to support the contention of the Senator from Maryland that coercion between union and union should be prohibited. It is not enough to say that in 48 jurisdictions there is sufficient remedy. If there is sufficient remedy, as the Senator from New York contends, let us put it in the act.

Mr. TYDINGS. And if there is sufficient remedy, then the mere insertion of these words, which make that for which the Senator from New York contends mandatory, can have no effect at all but to strengthen the bill for the ideal purpose which he espouses, of allowing labor to combine and collectively bargain without coercion from any source whatsoever.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President—

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. BORAH. Before the Senator from Maryland takes his seat I should like to ask a question. I understand the Senator from Maryland would add certain words to section 7.

Mr. TYDINGS. The words "without coercion or intimidation from any source."

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator from Maryland believe that if the situation is as he describes it, and a remedy is called for, those simple words will be sufficient to afford protection?

Mr. TYDINGS. I have another amendment in the same tenor which I intend to offer, to be inserted on page 11, between lines 15 and 16.

Mr. BORAH. Without taking too much time may I ask the Senator to read the amendment?

Mr. TYDINGS. This amendment would read:

It shall be unfair labor practice for any person to coerce employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed in section 7, or to coerce employees in their right to work or to join or not to join any labor organization.

Mr. BORAH. That seems to me to state a fundamental principle.

Mr. TYDINGS. Inasmuch as that is what the Senator from New York says he wants to obtain, namely, the right of labor to be removed from any coercion or intimidation, the right to collectively bargain for whatever they think would be better for themselves, and that nobody shall step in and frighten them, that nobody shall coerce them, if we do not keep that principle in the bill, then this boasted thing about labor having freedom is a farce, because we would simply take coercion away from one side and permit it on the other side. If it is wrong on one side, it is wrong on the other side.

A laborer ought to be entitled without coercion from any side to say whether he wants to join this, that, or the other union, and if it is wrong for the employer, as it is wrong, to coerce labor or intimidate labor, it is equally wrong for somebody else to coerce laborers and intimidate them. All I am asking is that labor be protected from any coercion or intimidation from any source whatsoever.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. The Senator will recall also that the bill provides that the majority may make the bargain for the minority.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. HASTINGS. So that under the provisions of the bill, if they succeed in getting a majority, by force, or coercion, or any other improper means, it is absolutely controlling over the 49 percent who have absolutely no rights and nothing to say.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am going to ask the Senator from New York a direct question. He does not need to answer it now, because he is going to respond in his own time.

I do not mean to belittle the efforts of the Senator from New York; I rather applaud them, because no Senator in this body is more anxious to help labor than is the Senator from New York. His whole impulse is to help the workingman, and certainly, although I have been against the Senator from New York on some propositions, I am in favor of the same rights being accorded labor.

I wish to ask the Senator from New York a question. He implies in his argument that it is wrong for the employer to coerce the employee, and with that I am in accord; but he implies in his argument that it is not wrong for a labor organization to coerce an employee who does not want to belong to the organization to which the coersers belong. It strikes me that, as a matter of logic, and in all fairness to the Senator, what he wants to obtain is the free and untrammelled right of labor to bargain without coercion of employee and without coercion of employer. He wants them both to have the right, without respect to any outside influence, to bargain for the common good.

Does he not say in effect that, although it is wrong for the employer to coerce labor—and he is right there—it is not wrong for an employee to coerce another employee?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I should like to ask the Senator a question. What is coercion by a labor representative would be for the court's interpretation, would it not?

Mr. TYDINGS. I think so.

Mr. LONG. So the court might hold that there was intimidation or coercion if an organizer said, "Only laboring men who are affiliated with our union are going to get jobs."

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course, the whole act will be interpreted by the courts, so far as that is concerned, but my business is not sitting on the court; my business, sitting here as a Senator, is to safeguard, so far as my humble intelligence will allow, the right of the American workingman not to be coerced by anybody in doing a perfectly legal thing, namely, collectively bargaining for his advancement and progress and better working conditions. I care not whether the coercion comes from above, comes from the bottom, or comes from an extraneous source, if it is coercion or intimidation, the laboring man does not have the chance to which he is entitled.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. The Senator knows that we have been trying to get laborers the right to organize for quite a while, and we never have been able to draft a law yet which has not been whittled down. By interpretation the laws have always been cut down. Does not the Senator think we can take a little chance for once in our lives for a little while? If the Senator from New York can draft an act that will protect labor, he will be the only man who has ever been able to do it. Nobody else has ever been able to do it with the court interpretations. I do not believe we ought to whittle away the bill and not take a chance.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield to me?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am unable to visualize an exactly parallel situation between the possible coercion of a workingman by his employer and the possible coercion of a workman by some other employee.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him right there, I will give him an opportunity to go on in my time. I take it for granted that the Senator does not want the laborer coerced by anybody. Is that correct?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not.

Mr. TYDINGS. If we all agree on that objective, then what is the harm in saying he shall not be coerced from any source whatever?

Mr. BARKLEY. There is nothing in the bill which assumes he is going to be coerced.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let us say so.

Mr. BARKLEY. He cannot be coerced to the same degree by a fellow employee as he might be by his employer. The employer might threaten to discharge him from his position. The employer might threaten him with a reduction in wages. The employer might threaten an employee by all sorts of forms of coercion and intimidation that would result in unemployment. But I do not know of such power as that possessed by an employee over one of his fellow employees.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I will yield to the Senator from Michigan in just a moment. Under my amendment the employer could not threaten an employee with a reduction in wages, he could not threaten him with longer hours, he could not threaten him with anything, because under the amendment an employee could not be coerced or intimidated by anybody.

Mr. BARKLEY. He could not be under the bill, so far as that is concerned, even without an amendment. It might be possible for an employee to persuade a fellow employee that he ought to belong to one union or another, but I cannot understand how a man who is working for wages can go to a man working for the same employer, or for a different employer, and intimidate or coerce the other employee to join or not to join a particular union, because neither one of them can fire the other from his job.

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. There is nothing in the bill and nothing in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland which would confine the coercion to employees in the same plant. I do not know whether or not the Senator from Kentucky was in the Chamber when I spoke, but I have worked in plants where hundreds of thousands of men were employed, and I know that there is competition between unions to get membership. I know of cases where leaders of labor unions who were not employees of the plants have gone out and threatened wives and children, telling them that if the husbands and fathers did not join their union, they would be discharged.

Mr. BARKLEY. That must be an extremely exceptional case.

Mr. COUZENS. That is a kind of coercion with which I am wholly familiar and, therefore, I believe it is vitally necessary to protect all employees against coercion. I have never, in my capacity as an employer, attempted to coerce any man to keep him from joining any union.

Mr. BARKLEY. I realize that, of course.

Mr. COUZENS. And I do not want any employer to do it. But why should an outside union, located here in Washington, or in Toledo, or somewhere else, go to Detroit and say to employees in some plant there, "If you do not join our union, we will punish your wife and children"? That is the kind of thing I want to have prevented.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right there?

Mr. COUZENS. I cannot talk if the Senator keeps talking at the same time.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thought the Senator from Michigan had found a stopping place.

Mr. COUZENS. No; unfortunately, I never can keep up with the Senator from Kentucky, so I take my seat and will let him talk for the rest of the day, as he usually does.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator need not get his ire up. I am asking him a sincere question, and I hope I will not give vent to my temper in doing it. I meant no reflection on the Senator from Michigan. I wanted to ask him a perfectly sincere and a perfectly civil question, the answer to which might grow out of his own experience.

I desired to ask the Senator from Michigan this question: Assuming he and I were employed by the same employer or by different employers as laboring men not belonging to any union, and somebody, either from the inside or from the outside, came to him or to me, or to both of us, to persuade us to join a particular union by arguing with us that it was a better union, or a more efficient or a more effective union than some other union. Would that be regarded as coercion or intimidation?

Mr. TYDINGS. No.

Mr. COUZENS. I certainly would not put such an absurd interpretation on it. That is just salesmanship, and I have no objection to labor unions anywhere selling their service and their membership. I want them to do it. But if I reach the conclusion that I want to decline to join any affiliation of the American Federation of Labor, I do not want some labor leader to go around threatening what they are going to do to me if I fail to submit to their salesmanship.

Mr. BARKLEY. One other question—and I propound this question to both the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], as well as to other Senators. Inasmuch as the court must pass on this bill if it shall be enacted, and must make an interpretation of conduct of men, is there a possibility that some court, some Federal judge, might hold that an effort to persuade me or the Senator from Michigan or anybody else to join a certain union or not to join another one, would be intimidation or coercion on the part of the fellow laborer?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. If the Senator from Kentucky wants to draw up an amendment so as to exclude that sort of interpretation, which I think would be ridiculous, I would support the amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. It would be no more ridiculous than some interpretations given heretofore by judges of provisions of the law.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. There is a very large body of workingmen who would not be covered either by the Senator's amendment or by the bill, that would enter into the question, of course; that is the body of men who do not belong to a union at all or who do not desire to.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true.

Mr. BORAH. They would not be covered either by the amendment or by the provisions of the bill. If we are to enter the field of legislation as between employees the bill would have to be radically changed.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I understood from the Senator's amendment that coercion on the part of any person was prevented, which would include all, whether that provision was in the bill or not.

Mr. BORAH. I am speaking of the right to collectively bargain.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; the right to collectively bargain.

Mr. BORAH. Section 7 of the bill deals only with collective bargaining.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me try to reduce the issue which has been joined here to its narrowest or most accurate limitations.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President—

Mr. TYDINGS. Just a moment. Let me develop this so that it will be before Senators as I see it. I do not believe there is a Senator on the floor who will contend that if my amendment is adopted, an employer can coerce an employee thereafter. Is there anyone who takes issue with that statement? There is not one Member of the Senate who does.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, without the Senator's amendment the bill forbids that. That is the very purpose of the bill. The Senator from Maryland is losing sight of the objective of the bill. It is not to regulate the relation of employee to employees, it is to regulate the relation of employees to employers.

Mr. TYDINGS. Just a moment. I asked if there was any Senator in this body who would say that if my amendment were adopted it would be legal for any employer to coerce any employee?

Mr. WALSH. Without the adoption of the Senator's amendment such coercion is illegal. That is provided in the bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. But my question is whether any Senator would make that statement if my amendment were adopted?

Mr. WALSH. The trouble is, however, that the amendment of the Senator from Maryland includes that and more too.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President—

Mr. TYDINGS. Just a moment. I do not want an argument at this point. I wish to know if there is any Senator who contends that if my amendment were adopted an employer could coerce an employee?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Does the Senator from Kentucky say "yes" in answer to my question?

Mr. BARKLEY. I desire to answer.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator from Kentucky answer my question first and then make an explanation?

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course I will.

Mr. TYDINGS. Very well.

Mr. BARKLEY. Nobody can contend that under the Senator's amendment an employer could coerce an employee.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is right.

Mr. BARKLEY. But he cannot do that even without the Senator's amendment. The language of the bill specifically prohibits that.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then what harm is there in putting my amendment in the bill?

Mr. BARKLEY. Because the Senator intends it to go much further than the relationship of employer and employee.

Mr. HASTINGS and Mr. WAGNER addressed the Chair.

Mr. TYDINGS. I cannot answer unless I have the opportunity to continue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators who desire to be recognized will address the Chair in proper order. Several Senators have addressed the Chair. Does the Senator from Maryland yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. TYDINGS. I will not yield now, but I will yield in just a moment, as soon as I have addressed myself to the point raised by the Senator from Kentucky.

Now, we have the situation that there is not a Senator in this body who contends that if my amendment were adopted any employer could coerce any employee. Not one says that is not true. They all say it is true. The Senator from Kentucky just said it is true. He said that would be true without my amendment. Certainly my amendment puts the clincher on it.

If that be true, who, then, is to be given the right or permitted to have the right to coerce and intimidate? Is someone else to have this right against which we inveigh in one breath and inferentially embrace in the next. If it is wrong for the employer to coerce his men—and it is wrong—is somebody else to be given the right to do the same wrong because he occupies, forsooth, a different position? What kind of logic is that, assuming that we are impelled by the high-sounding purpose written into this bill?

I now yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Maryland to a paragraph in the statement made by the President in the settlement of the automobile-industries strike in 1934, in which he used this language:

The Government makes it clear that it favors no particular union or particular form of employee organization or representation. The Government's only duty is to secure absolute and uninfluenced freedom of choice without coercion, restraint, or intimidation from any source.

Almost the exact language of the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a minute more. We have established a premise, and everybody agrees that under this amendment, and, it is contended, that even without it, no employer has the right to coerce or intimidate labor. Is there anyone here who contends that anybody else ought to have that right? I now pause for an answer to that question.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

Mr. TYDINGS. Just a moment. Let me make my question plain. Is there anyone in the Senate who contends that anybody ought to have the right to coerce and intimidate any labor group which desires to collectively bargain?

I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I would answer of course "no"; but I want the Senator to think of the proposition, that if we enter the field of collaborators or counions we must also include the man who does not belong to a union at all. We must protect him from coercion. That is where the great coercion operates. In framing this bill we have not entered that field at all.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is right.

Mr. BORAH. We have simply dealt with the employer and the employee. However, there is another field in which such legislation might be advisable. It cannot be incorporated, however, by a single amendment in this bill. There is much more to do in regard to it. That is what I should like to have the Senator think over before we vote on the question.

Mr. WAGNER rose.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me answer the Senator from Idaho, and then I will yield to the Senator from New York. I agree with the observations he has made. They deserve thought. However, I come back to this premise: Whatever we are dealing with within this bill, let us deal with it consistently. We are dealing with employers of a class and employees of a class, and certainly if we want to remove the employee from the coercion and the intimidation of the employer, let us remove the same employee from any other coercion and intimidation from which we can remove him.

I now yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. I wish to call to the attention of the Senator a point which was emphasized by the chairman of the committee, who, I am sure, will in due time explain the opposition of the committee toward the amendment which the Senator has offered. Aside from a few representatives of company unions, there was no one who seeks this amendment except the employer, who really is not concerned about protecting the workers in their efforts to organize. The Senator asks: "Is there any danger in this amendment? Should not coercion be prohibited?" If "coercion" were interpreted always as the Senator would like it to be, I should agree with him.

Mr. TYDINGS. I would have no objection to the Senator from New York writing out a definition of the word "coercion" and including that in the language.

Mr. WAGNER. The difficulty is that it cannot be done, because of interpretation by the courts. The courts have said that a threat to strike is coercion. With that in mind, the Senator can see the reason why the large employers have been fighting for his amendment. The Chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor will support my statement that if we had agreed to that amendment the employers would have cheered for this bill. It would have helped them more than domination of a union.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator has asked me a question, and I am answering his question.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; but let me point out to the Senator that he is talking about an erroneous proposition.

Mr. WAGNER. Oh, no; I am talking about the interpretation by the courts of the word "coercion."

Mr. TYDINGS. No; the Senator is branching off into the philosophy of the bill and is not talking on the amendment.

Mr. WAGNER. I am talking about the court's interpretation of "coercion."

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator will just be patient for a minute, I think I will show him where he is wrong.

Mr. WAGNER. Very well.

Mr. TYDINGS. The amendment would make the section read as follows:

SEC. 7. Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities, for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection free from coercion or intimidation from any source.

The Senator from New York cites as being in conflict with this amendment a case where a group of men threaten to strike. All I am attempting to do by my amendment is to permit them to threaten to strike without coercion or intimidation from any outside source. They can collectively bargain and nobody can coerce them or intimidate them. The illustration which the Senator presents is that if the Senate should put in the bill the provision that employees shall not be coerced or intimidated, they could not even threaten to strike for higher wages; and that is beside the point.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield? The Senator did not permit me to finish my recital of what the courts have held.

Mr. TYDINGS. No; because the Senator was discussing something not before the Senate.

Mr. WAGNER. Oh, yes; it is before the Senate. How about peaceful persuasion? That has been held in some jurisdictions to be coercion.

Mr. GORE. I suggest that we can "except" that out.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator bear with me a moment? I know what he is discussing; but he is not discussing my amendment.

My amendment simply gives to employees the right to bargain collectively without coercion or intimidation from anybody, and if they want to bargain and say, "We are going to strike if you do not raise our wages 10 percent", there is nothing in my amendment which would prevent it, and the Senator knows it. If they want to say to an employer, "The working conditions here are horrible, and we are not going to keep on under these conditions", there is nothing in the amendment—and the Senator knows it—which will require them to continue working. What the Senator is arguing is that if these words are put into the bill labor cannot strike. I say that under this amendment they can take any action they desire to take, and they have the assurance that they shall not be coerced or intimidated—not the employer but the workingman shall not be coerced or intimidated by anybody in collective bargaining.

The Senator has not been addressing his remarks to that question; he has been addressing them to a supposition which the amendment does not embrace. What is that supposition? That, if the amendment were adopted and a group of men should meet and collectively bargain in an effort to obtain shorter hours or more pay or better working conditions, the fact that we say they shall not be coerced and intimidated is going to militate against them in accomplishing the objective they seek to attain. All that I propose to provide by this amendment is that if labor organizes and bargains collectively for any purpose whatsoever, nobody shall dare to coerce or intimidate them in the seeking of any objective they may have in mind.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to conclude by reading the section as it will read if my amendment shall be adopted. Here is how it will then read:

Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities, for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection free from coercion or intimidation from any source.

Instead of taking rights away from them in collective bargaining the amendment would throw additional safeguards around those rights. It provides that they shall not be coerced and that they shall not be intimidated from any source whatsoever in asking for more wages or for shorter hours or better working conditions or for this or for that. That is all the amendment provides, and I hope the Senate will adopt it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I have refrained from discussing this bill because the able Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] presented every aspect of it fully and ably yesterday, but the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] raises the question of what is this bill all about? What is its objective? What does it do and what does it not do?

First of all, it does not require or request any employee to join any organization of any kind, shape, form, or character. Secondly, it does not seek to encourage or bring about the establishment of any labor organization under any employer where there is now none. It makes absolutely no change whatever in existing law, so far as the relation of employers and employees are concerned, except in those limited respects that relate to collective bargaining and the right of employees to organize without interference by employers. What the law now is with respect to the relations of employees with each other remains as it is. This is not a police court bill to punish employers or employees in the criminal courts for assaults, threats, or use of force. It does make two important changes in the relations of employer and employee; and the reason for the changes is an act passed by Congress, the National Recovery Act, which included a section known as section 7 (a). In that act, and under section 7 (a), we declared as a Federal policy the right of employees to organize, to choose the representatives of their own selection for the purpose of engaging in collective bargaining with their employers. It was a mere declaration of a principle. It was like saying religion is free and doing nothing to prevent barriers being set up designed to obstruct the free exercise of religion; it was like saying the press is free and doing nothing to prescribe what should be considered violations of the rights of the press to be free.

A voluntary Board, the National Labor Board, with Senator WAGNER as chairman, was set up by the President which had no real legal authority to administer that declaration of the right of employees to engage in collective bargaining. The Board had the right to make suggestions to the officials of the N. R. A., and the N. R. A. in some instances had the right to take away the Blue Eagle which was given to the employers by reason of their loyalty to the principles of the N. R. A. It was ineffective; the Board was helpless. The result was that a bill was presented to Congress at the last session similar in substance to the pending bill, attempting to set up machinery to make effective the declaration of Congress that employees should have the right to engage in collective bargaining.

Toward the latter part of the session the bill was reported to the Senate, but, because the Congress was getting ready to adjourn, the President suggested a compromise measure, which became known as Resolution 44, which authorized the President to set up a Board for the purpose of regulating elections held by employees for the purpose of designating their representatives for collective bargaining. Even that resolution was powerless, though it did attempt to give authority to the Board to hold elections of employees to determine who should represent them in collective bargaining. It was impotent, because, where employers resist an election order by the Board, provision is made for a court review prior to holding the election, and several cases are now in the courts, and the Board has not been able to hold elections.

So we have a situation of saying employees are free to engage in collective bargaining—

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator said that Resolution 44 was ineffective. Will he tell us before he concludes why Resolution 44 was ineffective?

Mr. WALSH. It was ineffective, as I think I stated, because of appeals to the courts. In cases where attempts have been made to hold elections the claim has been made that the Board had no legal authority; the cases have been brought into court, and they are in the courts and undecided. It has been effective where the employer was willing to cooperate with the Board and hold elections; it has been effective in that respect; but where there has been resistance there has been no effect.

Mr. COUZENS. Would the passage of the pending bill remove the appeals to the courts?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; it would because it limits appeals. It provides for review in the courts only after the election has been held and the Board has ordered the employer to do something predicated upon the results of the election.

Now, let me proceed. I was stating the effect of Resolution 44.

What does the pending bill do? It does two things: It seeks to make effective the right of employees to organize and engage in collective bargaining. To that I have heard no objection. It also defines what is improper or unfair for the employer to do in trying to prevent the accomplishment of that objective. These are called "unfair labor practices."

Why does it deal with the employer and say, "You cannot coerce any employee"? Here is the fundamental problem involved in all this: The employer is the only person who can effectively coerce an employee.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. WALSH. I will yield when I shall have finished the thought. The employer has the economic power; he can discharge any employee or any group of employees when their only offense may be to seek to form a legitimate organization among the workers for the purpose of collective bargaining. This bill declares that is wrong. It declares that the employee has the right to engage in collective bargaining, and it says, "Mr. Employer, you must keep your hands off; you shall not use that effective power of dismissal from employment which you have and destroy the organization of the employees by the dismissal of one or more of your employees when they are objectionable on no other ground than that they belong to or have organized a labor union."

I now yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, my clear recollection is that during the textile strike the newspapers carried a story to the effect that the members of the union who were responsible for the strike sent their own crews, their own groups, to other mills where the union did not prevail and made it so uncomfortable for the employees at the other mills that they were compelled to quit work and close the mills. Is that a thing the Congress would like to approve of, in the first place, and, if it is not, would not the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland prevent that sort of thing?

Mr. WALSH. If that happened under present conditions and under the present law, a court of equity could now restrain it, but this proposed board is not an appropriate tribunal to restrain that sort of thing, as is clearly pointed out in the committee report. That is the trouble. There is plenty of law otherwise to deal with that sort of thing, and I will come to that in a moment.

One of the reasons why personally I am one of the few Senators here who do not particularly engage in running debate is that I think the more effective way to present a case to the Senate is for the Senator who moves an amendment to discuss and explain it, and then let the answer be made, because otherwise there is iteration and reiteration which consumes the time of the Senate. Therefore I should like to be permitted to continue my argument, because before the conclusion of my presentation I expect to deal with the subject the Senator raises.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from Massachusetts has said, as I understand, that the proposed law changes the existing status only in two fundamental particulars. Will he discuss before he concludes whether or not it does not change another fundamental proposition, namely, the right of the majority to control the minority, the existing status under the Executive order of the President, as I understand, being that there is proportionate representation in connection with collective bargaining?

Mr. WALSH. I will be glad to discuss that question.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is not that another fundamental difference?

Mr. WALSH. I would not say so. It is fundamental to the extent of that part of the bill which relates to designating who shall be the representatives of the employees in collective bargaining. If a labor union is going to be organized, there has to be someone to speak for the employees, and that someone must be the representative of the majority; but that does not prevent the other employees discussing their grievances with their employer. It means that for the purpose of collective bargaining, when the representatives of the employees knock at the door of the employer, he will say, "Do you represent a majority of my employees? If so, all right; come in and I will undertake to engage in collective bargaining with you as the chosen representatives of my employees." That is all it means.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. WAGNER. There is no Executive order, so far as I know, that provides for proportionate representation. When I was Chairman of the National Labor Board, there was an Executive order which directed the Board to provide for elections, after which those selected by the majority were to represent all in the collective-bargaining process.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator forgive another interruption, because I am anxious to be sure I understand this phase of the situation?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. So far as the great automobile industry is concerned, it is operating, is it not, under the Presidential order which recognizes, in effect, proportionate representation?

Mr. WAGNER. An automobile labor board was appointed to deal with that subject. However, that was a settlement out of court. So far as the fundamental principle to which the Senator has referred is concerned, majority rule is the only sound rule in collective bargaining.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. If we recognize the right of collective bargaining, does it not follow of necessity that we must deal with representatives chosen by the majority? Otherwise, the problem would be reduced to an absurdity. If we had to recognize one minority we would have to recognize other minorities, and so we would defeat the entire purposes of collective bargaining if we should adopt any other rule than that of recognizing the representatives chosen by the majority.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That might be an absurdity, but that is the fact acknowledged in the order of the President settling the automobile difficulties. As I understand, under the pending bill the majority chosen to speak collectively in a given unit thereby automatically speak for the entire unit.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but this discussion is, of course, not germane to the amendment pending.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Oh, I understand that.

Mr. WALSH. Let me say that the bill requires no employer to sign any contract, to make any agreement, to reach any understanding with any employee or group of employees. The trouble about the bill is that it is so much misunderstood. Let me state just what the bill does not do, for it is greatly misunderstood and much misrepresented.

The board created in the bill is not going to be empowered to settle all labor disputes. Indeed, we can perhaps best understand the limited but important provisions of this bill by reciting, first, what aspects of the employers' relationship with employees the bill does not deal with.

Nothing in this bill allows the Federal Government or any agency to fix wages, to regulate rates of pay, to limit hours of work, or to effect or govern any working condition in any establishment or place of employment.

Nothing in this bill requires any employee to join any form of labor organization.

Nothing in this bill requires the employees in any industry to organize.

Nothing in this bill requires an employer to compel his employees to organize. All employees are free to choose to organize or not to organize, to join any or whatever labor organization or union they choose. If employees choose to organize a shop committee or a union for a particular plant or company, they may do so. If employees choose to form a union affiliated with any national or international organization, they may do so. There is nothing in this bill that compels any employer to make any agreement about wages, hours of employment, or working conditions with his employees.

The bill does provide the means and manner in which employees may approach their employers to discuss grievances and permit the board to ascertain and certify the persons or organization favored by a majority of the employees to represent them in collective bargaining, when the question of that representation is in doubt or dispute. Beyond this the bill does not go.

A crude illustration is this: The bill indicates the method and manner in which employees may organize, the method and manner of selecting their representatives or spokesmen, and leads them to the office door of their employer with the legal authority to negotiate for their fellow employees. The bill does not go beyond the office door. It leaves the discussion between the employer and the employee, and the agreements which they may or may not make, voluntary and with that sacredness and solemnity to a voluntary agreement with which both parties to an agreement should be enshrouded.

When a dispute arises between an employer and a group or groups of employees as to which organization is the legal one, the company union, the A. B. C. union, the fellowship union, or the trade union, the board takes jurisdiction, and thus is determined who and what kind of a labor organization represents the employees. The board will arrange for an election and provide for secret ballot. It will then find out what organization represents the majority of the employees and who are to be the representatives.

What is the second feature? It is well known from experiences between employers and employees that employers at times, though not all of them, seek to deny their employees the right to organize, and do so by indirect means, by economic pressure of one kind and another. They sometimes seek to dictate the kind of organization. In some instances they seek to control, by financial assistance and by favors extended to a certain class of employees, the particular kind of organization they desire. All the bill does is to define these as unfair labor practices on the part of the employer and say, "These things you may not do, because your employees must be free to say what kind of organization they want, whether a company union, a trade union, a fraternal union, or whatever it may be. You must keep your hands off. You may not dismiss a man because he joins one of these unions. You may not dismiss a man because he is a representative chosen by his fellows."

In substance, reduced to a very few sentences, that is really all there is to the bill.

Let me emphasize again: When the employees have chosen their organization, when they have selected their representatives, all the bill proposes to do is to escort them to the door of their employer and say, "Here they are, the legal representatives of your employees." What happens behind those doors is not inquired into, and the bill does not seek to inquire into it. It anticipates that the employer will deal reasonably with the employees, that he will be patient, but he is obliged to sign no agreement; he can say, "Gentlemen, we have heard you and considered your proposals. We cannot comply with your request"; and that ends it.

There is no effort in that respect to change the situation which exists today. All employers are left free in the future as in the past to accept whatever terms they choose.

There is practically no change whatever in the present conditions affecting employers and employees except to provide for the creation of the machinery without interference by employers to permit employees to choose representatives to go to their employers for the purpose of collective bargaining. This is done because we have found that the reason why there are labor difficulties, labor disputes from time to time, is that employers will not confer with their men, will not meet them, do not know who are their representatives, because some of them say, "I will talk with this group but not with that group." The bill would provide that the men chosen by the employees shall represent their fellow employees and would say to the employer, "They are legally here to deal with you and engage in collective bargaining."

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question. It has been repeatedly stated in criticism of the bill that it outlaws the company union. I inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts whether that is correct and, if so, how the end is accomplished?

Mr. WALSH. I shall be pleased to answer the Senator's question and he will pardon me if I take a little time to do so.

After section 7 (a) was adopted the representatives of organized labor in the country felt that the time had come to extend their activities in the way of organizing employees where there were no labor organizations. In many sections of the country employees proceeded to try to organize unions of one kind or another. Certain employers, for the purpose of preventing what they thought was an antagonistic or hostile labor union, began organizing what are known as "company unions." They got a majority of their employees to form a union and to choose representatives from that union to represent them in collective bargaining.

Much contention, resulting in many strikes, followed. There were counterclaims by the trade-union organizers and the company-union organizers as to which had a majority of the employees in a particular shop, with the result that elections were demanded and held.

This bill gives no legal sanction or approval to any labor organization whatever. It does not mention the name "trade union" or any other national or local labor organization. It does not mention the name "American Federation of Labor." It does not mention the name "company union." It does this, which some employers who have company unions resist; namely, it restricts somewhat the methods now pursued in financing company unions.

In some company unions the employer hires the hall where the union meets, pays for the ballots, employs clerical help for the union, pays salaries to the representatives of the workers. This is called, among the employees, a "company-dominated" union. That is why the Senator from New York uses that expression, meaning that it is not free, because the financial hand and the influence of the employer are such that they become dominating, and it is not a union such as free employees are entitled to have if they choose.

So the result is that we restrict contributions made to any union—the American Federation of Labor or the company unions; and money can be paid by an employer in the case of either one of them—the American Federation of Labor or any other trade union or any other international union—only to the representatives of the employees when they are, during working hours, sitting in with their employers, engaged in collective bargaining. We permit that to be done; but the other expenditures which have been made in the past have been the source of some criticism.

Personally, I feel in any law no distinction ought to be made between company unions and trade unions. If company unions are wrong, if they are not representative of the men, if they are not really engaged in honest collective bargaining, we must give the employees of this country, men and women, credit for recognizing that and overthrowing, in time, such organizations. Similarly, if the American Federation of Labor or any other union is not honestly and sincerely and devotedly interested in the welfare of its members, we must recognize the fact that sooner or later the employees belonging to it will, in some election, move out of the American Federation of Labor and into an international union or other union of some kind, a different union of their own.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator meant to name one other common practice of these company-dominated unions. In nearly all cases, their constitutions are drafted by the employer, and contain provisions preventing modification without the consent of the employer.

Mr. WALSH. What the Senator from New York has said is very important. We found at our hearings that many of the company unions had had their constitutions and by-laws prepared by the employers and handed over to them, and there are provisions in the constitutions and by-laws that no changes can be made without the consent of the employers. Of course, such an organization is not a free labor organization, and cannot be held to be such.

Directly answering the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], I should say that there is nothing in this bill which is antagonistic to company unions except that some of them will have to lessen the amount of contributions made by the employers to the representatives of the employees in company unions; but they are permitted to make the expenditures I have named.

Now we come to the immediate problem under consideration.

We have not gone in this bill into the field of relationship between employee and employee. We have been dealing only with the right of the employee to engage in collective bargaining with his employer. If an employee threatens to burn the house of a fellow employee unless he joins his union, there is ample provision of law to cover such a case. If an employee or employer assaults an employee, there is ample existing law to cover that case. That is a domain that we have not entered into, because we are not dealing with it. We are not going to encourage or discourage employees with reference to organizing unions. It is made their business, but if they desire to organize, this bill provides the method and protection to do so.

Many employers have urged that the bill should contain a provision to the effect that it constituted an unfair labor practice for an employee or a group of employees to interfere or coerce an employee to join any particular labor organization.

They have indicated that the bill would be acceptable to them if such a provision was included in the bill, because they stated it would put both employees and employers in a like status so far as interference or coercion by employee or employer with respect to joining or refraining from joining a labor organization is concerned.

The committee carefully considered this proposal and reached the conclusion that such an adoption would be unwise and that this principle was founded upon a misconception of the bill.

An employee, like an employer, of course, has the right to discuss the merits of any organization. Indeed, Congress could not constitutionally pass a law abridging the freedom of speech.

On the other hand, an employee, like an employer, cannot lawfully use threats of physical violence, or inflict physical damage upon persons or tangible property. If he does so, the civil and in many cases the criminal laws of the several States could be invoked, and he could be fined or sent to jail.

The bill now under consideration does not enter into these realms of free speech or physical violence. It does not establish a police court. It does not deal with physical coercion, but with economic coercion. And economic coercion is a weapon that could be exercised by the man who hires and discharges, and not by a fellow employee. Only an employer has it within his power to use economic pressure.

The use of the clause suggested has another danger that is not immediately apparent, but against which it is necessary to guard. The Supreme Court of the United States in the Hitchman case, and State courts in other cases, have construed the word "coercion" to embrace strikes and picketing. Strikes and picketing are in many cases unjustifiable and unwise, but the purpose of this bill is not to outlaw all strikes and all pickets. Yet if Congress were to make it an unfair practice for an employee to coerce his fellow employees to join or to refrain from joining an organization, some court, relying on earlier decisions, and not adequately informed of the purpose of this bill, might conclude that strikes and pickets had been made unlawful.

I hope I have removed some of the prevailing misgivings and misrepresentations concerning this bill and retained respect for the purposes of this legislation. The bill is intended to provide a medium and method of peaceful settlement of disputes arising over employees' rights to organize and to assure employees protection against interference and coercion by their employers.

This is not intended to be a reflection upon the employers of this country. For most of them no such legislation is needed. For most people no statute is needed preventing larceny, but because there is a statute forbidding larceny there is no intention to reflect upon the honesty and law-abiding spirit of our people. This bill is intended to restrain that class of employers who have failed to realize the thing we call social justice as between employer and employee.

If employers accept the law in a friendly and cooperative way, and if employees realize that these rights are granted not for the purpose of arousing hostilities or misunderstandings between them and their employees but for the purpose of paving the way for cooperation and mutual progress, it should instill and promote better relations between all classes and groups in industry.

When an employer undertakes to interfere because he does not want a labor union among his employees, dismissing and discharging people in various ways, or ordering them out of the tenement houses of his company because they have joined a union, that is a coercion and an interference, this bill declares, over which this National Labor Relations Board shall have jurisdiction.

The courts will have in the future all the jurisdiction they have ever had in relation to all the differences which arise between employers and employees; but this newly created board will have jurisdiction only over the things that relate to the election of representatives of employees, and only in the prevention of the unfair practices that impede and stop the worker from organizing and engaging in collective bargaining with his employer.

JAMES STEWART CO.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I was called out of the Chamber, and a message was delivered to me by a gentleman who tells me that he is an attorney at law. I desire to send it to the desk and ask to have it read, in view of the fact that some of my colleagues the other day made the suggestion that when such matters as this came to my knowledge they should not be withheld.

Therefore I ask that the clerk read the statement, which I send to the desk, as my voice is a little weak. This is a message delivered to me by an attorney at law, who gives me his name, which I can furnish later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

I have two clients, Monon Stone Co. and Wollery Stone Co., of Bloomington, Ind., whose officers would like an opportunity to appear before the United States Senate to tell that Mr. Watts, the vice president of the James Stewart Co., made a deal with them and instructed that, in advance of formal approval by the Government, that the said concerns should begin to fabricate certain stone for public works of the United States, particularly the Department of Labor and Interstate Commerce Commission buildings, the said Watts stating: "Go right ahead without the approval of the supervising architects. We can get the approval of the agents of the Government on whatever we want to use", or words to the effect. That these facts were alleged in a suit now pending and the said Stewart Co. moved to strike out the part relating to the said Watts' instructions on the ground that it was contrary to public policy, but the United States court overruled the motion. That these persons, who will prove these facts and others of its kind, are available for call at any time.

This the 16th day of May 1935.

Mr. O'MAHONEY subsequently said: Mr. President, earlier in the day the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] presented for the RECORD a message from an unnamed attorney which has just been called to my attention. This message was to the effect that certain clients of the attorney—the Monon Stone Co. and the Wollery Stone Co.—had entered into some sort of deal with Mr. Watts, vice president of the James Stewart Co., in which Mr. Watts had instructed the officers of these two companies that they should proceed to fabricate certain stone for public works of the United States, particularly the Department of Labor and Interstate Commerce Commission building, in advance of the approval of the contract.

I am advised that the contract for this building—it is one building, the Department of Labor and the Interstate Commerce Commission building—was let on June 18, 1932, almost a year before the beginning of the present administration, and that the stonework was all completed before the present administration began. So, if there was any such deal, it was made before this administration came into power.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I understand from this attorney that the deal applied to several buildings, the Interstate Commerce Commission building, the Labor building, and other buildings.

It is too bad that the authorities will not allow these witnesses to appear and testify to these matters. It is too bad that these ex parte statements confuse matters all the time. My understanding is, however, that these things carried over.

It is too bad that we have these ex parte statements from either side, but the citizens of the United States desiring to testify about these corruptions which they allege to exist are not permitted to come and give their testimony. That is not my fault, and, of course, it is not a fault to be charged against the Senator from Wyoming, except that he votes wrong.

DONALD R. RICHBERG

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I have no desire whatever to delay the consideration of this very important measure. Therefore, I shall make my remarks as brief as may be possible. However, in view of the incident which took place on the day before yesterday, while the Senate of the United States had under consideration a joint resolution dealing with the N. R. A., I do feel that some notice of it should be taken in this body.

Mr. President, never since the decadent days of the Roman Empire, when the Praetorian Guard arrogated to itself the right to set up and pull down emperors, has there been a more arrogant performance than that of day before yesterday upon the part of Mr. Donald R. Richberg, Chairman of the National Industrial Recovery Board.

It is an amazing spectacle, to say the least, for a Federal employee to call a meeting of several hundred other Federal employees, there to denounce the Senate of the United States, elected by the people, because in pursuance of the authority and duties imposed upon it by the Constitution, it saw fit not to obey the behest of Mr. Richberg by guaranteeing these employees a tenure of 2 additional years on the pay roll, but, for the present, limited these pay-roll enjoyments to a period which would enable the Congress to legislate in the light of a Supreme Court decision.

When it is remembered that the 1,500 employees assembled to hear, and doubtless to cheer, Mr. Richberg's pronunciamento occupy their places at the will of Mr. Richberg, that the terms and salaries of their employment are subject not to regulation by law but to regulation by Mr. Richberg and his Board, the spectacle of Mr. Richberg lecturing the Senate before such an audience for its well-nigh unanimous action becomes the more striking.

To be sure, Mr. President, we learn today from the public press—the Baltimore Sun and other public prints—that it is the statement of high N. R. A. officials that it was the intention to have only the higher executives of the N. R. A. present at Mr. Richberg's address, but that other employees simply drifted in. It was a singular coincidence, however, that the meeting arranged for Mr. Richberg and the higher executives of the N. R. A. happened to be held in an auditorium which will comfortably seat some 2,000 persons, and that employees to the number of some 1,500 just happened to drift into the meeting.

It may not be out of place to add that if the N. R. A. has no more to do than to permit 1,500 employees, drifting idly about the halls, to interpose their presence at a meeting to which they were not invited, and which was not intended for them, the sooner such employees are separated from the Federal pay roll the better it will be at least for the public.

We are told that in his arrogance Mr. Richberg took it upon himself to overrule the judgment of this body by dubbing its action complete folly, and denounced the overwhelming majority of Senators as opposing concepts so sound that only confused, muddled minds could attack them. By inference he both criticized the courts of the land and anticipated the decision of the highest court by alleging that the courts were to be left to deal with the N. R. A. just as harshly as possible.

Who gave Mr. Richberg the right to anticipate court action and to assert that the N. R. A. would be treated just as harshly as possible by the courts of the land?

Upon what meat doth this our Caesar feed,
That he is grown so great?

Having now put the Senate in its place, if the resolution passed by the Senate day before yesterday shall be adopted by the Congress doubtless Mr. Richberg will call another meeting of N. R. A. employees to include the whole Congress within the scope of his denunciation.

If the Supreme Court should see fit, in the performance of its functions, to declare unconstitutional any part of the act, doubtless prompt appeal will be taken by Mr. Richberg to the pay-roll brigade of the N. R. A., and the highest court will be roundly denounced for its harsh treatment.

If, perchance, the President of the United States should see fit to sign the resolution extending the period of the operation of N. R. A. until only April 1, 1936, the council of N. R. A. employees will doubtless decree his deposition from office and banishment from the imperial favors of Mr. Richberg's smile.

Mr. President, the head and front of the Senate's offending is, first, that it refused to guarantee the jobs of the bureaucrats of the N. R. A., great and small, for a period of 2 years after June 16, 1935.

Second, that it refused to permit Mr. Richberg to write into the law a new, revolutionary, and, in my opinion, unconstitutional definition of interstate commerce.

Third, that it refused to take action rendering all pending cases in the courts moot, and preferred to consider permanent legislation in the light of construction by the courts.

Mr. President, it was stated the other day by the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], that in his opinion 90 percent of the vices of the N. R. A., so abundantly proved and disclosed in the 7 or 8 weeks' investigation by the Finance Committee, were due to vices of administration. I agree with the chairman of the committee that vicious practices of administration, outrageous assumption of powers not given by the act, constant attempts to reach out and gather in jurisdiction never intended to be conferred by the act, ruthless oppression of small business, have been very largely due to administrative conduct of the N. R. A., and have vastly complicated the inherent defects in the act itself. I submit that the conduct of the N. R. A. executives in holding this meeting to denounce action of the Senate while the Congress of the United States was in process of considering appropriate action, gives a large measure of suggestiveness as to the responsibility for the administrative practices which have so largely contributed to make the N. R. A. a failure.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have no desire to engage in any controversy with my good friend the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] with respect to the N. R. A. or any of its administrative officers. He and I disagree fundamentally on the N. R. A. I favored the law when it was enacted, and the Senator from Missouri opposed it. I still believe that great good has been accomplished by the N. R. A., and when, as a member of the Committee on Finance, I entered, along with my colleagues, into the investigation which had been ordered by the Senate, which lasted for some 7 weeks, it was my understanding that we were commissioned, in part at least, to ascertain what good had come from the N. R. A., what there was about it which was workable and practicable and which ought to be preserved, while at the same time eliminating whatever had been found to be unjust or unworkable or impracticable.

At the end of the 7 weeks' deliberation, in which we went minutely and exhaustively into the administration of the N. R. A., instead of writing a bill, as I understood our province or our expectation was, the joint resolution which has already passed the Senate was reported.

I shall not enter into a discussion of that. In the committee I did not believe in an 8 months' extension of the N. R. A. because I believed it would leave business still up in the air and uncertain as to what its fate would finally be. On the other hand, I did not believe it wise to precipitate the issue of the N. R. A. into the middle of a presidential campaign without regard to anybody's opinion of it.

I also entertained the belief, and I now entertain the belief, which I shall only state, but not discuss, that it was unfair to corporations engaged in interstate commerce to require that they should be under a code of fair practice, that they should reduce the hours of labor of their employees and increase the wages of their employees, and be compelled to eliminate cut-throat and unfair practices while leaving their competitors, many of whom probably were more extensive in their business than those engaged in interstate commerce, free from any restriction whatever along that line.

In the famous Shreveport case the Supreme Court held that Congress had the right not only to regulate the practices of railroads engaged in interstate commerce, but that they might likewise regulate and nullify the practices of railroads engaged wholly in intrastate commerce if such practices operated as burdens upon interstate commerce. The Supreme Court held that in that field, if Congress saw fit to take charge of it, Congress was supreme. So I felt that there might be justification for including an amendment which would not only authorize the formation of codes among institutions engaged in interstate commerce but that it might likewise take in other institutions, although engaged in intrastate commerce, whose business was so extensive and of such a character as to compete substantially and materially with that of corporations engaged in interstate commerce.

I did not press that view, but I expressed it in the committee and in the conference which the majority held, and I have not changed my views up to the present time.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not want to get into a discussion of that question; I am merely stating what my view was; but I yield.

Mr. LONG. It seems to me that the Senator from Missouri, if I may have his attention, was complaining because of the mere fact that some man in charge of a bureau was haranguing the Senate—

Mr. BARKLEY. I am coming to that later.

Mr. LONG. Overruling the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am coming to that. But I wanted to state the background of circumstances which leads me to suggest that personally I agree with some of the opinions expressed before our committee by Mr. Donald Richberg, who is the object of the criticism of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator permit me just to finish my observation?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. LONG. I felt that the Senator from Missouri was rather late.

Mr. BARKLEY. I suppose that nobody could criticize any member of the N. R. A. administrative staff for coming before the Committee on Finance any more than criticism would be made of a Cabinet officer or any other administrative officer of the Government for coming before a committee to testify upon matters in the administration of which he had had experience.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I agree entirely with the Senator in that respect. I certainly had no thought of criticizing any member of the N. R. A. or any other Government official who might be summoned to come before a Senate or House committee, there to give testimony. My criticism goes to the point of one Government employee getting together a mass meeting of other Government employees to denounce action being taken by a branch of the National Legislature.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have seen in the public press and elsewhere criticism of the fact that Mr. Richberg held a conference yesterday or last night with the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee, discussing for some 3 hours the problem of the N. R. A. extension.

Getting down to the matter now under discussion, after the Senator from Missouri yesterday gave notice that he would make a speech this morning with respect to the meeting at the auditorium of the Commerce Building, at which he took offense, I called up Mr. Richberg and asked if there was a copy of the speech which he delivered. He advised me that it was not a prepared speech, that it was delivered wholly extemporaneously, but that a stenographer was there and took a stenographic report of the speech which he delivered. I asked him to send a transcript of the speech to me in order that we might see what he said and the circumstances under which he said it, in order that inasmuch as he has no right to speak here in the Senate, at least his attitude and the occasion for the speech and the reason for it might be divulged to the Senate.

The speech was transmitted to me this morning, and I have also received a letter from Mr. Richberg, which I think I should read into the RECORD. It is dated May 16, and is as follows:

NATIONAL RECOVERY ADMINISTRATION,
Washington.

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: You may be interested in learning the reason for the speech I made to the members of the N. R. A. organization on Tuesday. Several days before I had been advised by administrative officials that it would be desirable to address the organization for the purpose of improving its morale. It should be realized that the uncertainty over the extension of the N. R. A. would necessarily have a demoralizing effect upon its personnel. Furthermore, the N. R. A. has contained a large percentage of enthusiastic workers who have worked overtime, or in many cases have volunteered their services without compensation, because of their faith and interest in the program.

Therefore I agreed to talk to the organization, and only made the meeting public because otherwise the newspapermen would have given it undue importance as a secret meeting. My remarks were made extemporaneously and for the purpose of pointing out, first, that the N. R. A. was merely one phase of the necessary development of improved industrial cooperation, and that therefore, whether this particular work continued or not, the organization had played a useful part in bringing about new measures of human cooperation. Second, that the experience they had all received would have a lasting value. Third, that it appeared that in any event this work would go forward either through extension of the present law or through some other form of supplying a necessary public service.

A transcript of my remarks was made and I enclose a copy. You will observe that they were not directed in any way as personal criticism of any Members of the Senate or House. They consist largely of an historical review and a philosophic discussion of the future. One or two phrases taken out of their context may have led to a misunderstanding of the purpose of my remarks or of what I actually said. But I believe, if you will glance them over, you will see that they were in good temper and in good taste, and that they were designed for no other purpose except to help improve the good will, loyalty, and efficiency of a large organization which is being required to carry forward a very difficult task under very difficult conditions. You will also note that I pointed out with due humility that whereas we in the organization might think we knew more intimately the problems with which we had been dealing than those who were criticizing the N. R. A., nevertheless we might be wrong and the critics might be right. If these remarks are subject to attack, it seems to me they should be considered as a whole and that a few expressions should not be taken out of the context and given a wholly different meaning from that clearly intended.

Sincerely yours,

DONALD R. RICHBERG.

Perhaps I should add that since I accepted appointment to my present position only on the express understanding that it would be temporary, and since I have frequently expressed my desire and intention of returning to private practice, I have no private interest in the extension of the N. R. A., and have always felt free to express my opinions without any bias of selfish interest. I have no interest in making or retaining any public job for myself or anyone else. But I do believe that the public interest is deeply involved in the success of President Roosevelt's administration and his recovery program.

I hesitate to take the time of the Senate to have the very brief speech which Mr. Richberg delivered on that occasion read to the Senate, because I am sure the Senate would consent that it be printed in the RECORD; but it seems to me this speech was so in point, it was in such good taste, it was in such fine humor, and it was of such a philosophic nature in dealing with the great problems which confront the country, that it would be valuable to have it read, and I ask that it be read by the clerk in my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

ADDRESS OF MR. DONALD R. RICHBERG, CHAIRMAN NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY BOARD, WASHINGTON, D. C., MAY 14, 1935

[Not a prepared speech. Delivered extemporaneously. This is a stenographic transcript]

I want to say in advance that the purpose of this talk is not to voice any criticism of anyone, either in or outside of N. R. A., and it is not for the purpose of publicity, although it is in no sense a secret meeting. It is not designed for the purpose of making any publicity.

I want to talk to the members of the organization somewhat upon the background of the present situation and upon the attack on N. R. A. When I see the new and hereditary foes of wicked business and commercial evils out gunning for the N. R. A., I am reminded of a very old story that happens to be so appropriate that I think it is worth retelling.

A Dutchman went out hunting, but came back with nothing in the hunting bag and looking very glum. A friend said to him, derisively, "You been hunting?"

"Yes."

"Shoot anything?"

"I shoot my dog."

"Was he mad?"

"Didn't seem so damn pleased."

I don't think anybody is going to be so pleased after the dog is shot, if the dog is shot.

We have been engaged here in a very ancient effort to make the competitive struggle serve the common good. The effort is as old as the origin of anything resembling trade and commerce. The fight against monopolistic or unfair competitive tendencies goes away back into the earliest stages and phases of trade and commerce. The particular phase of our modern commercial operations—indeed, I might say our entire modern civilization—began, well, about 50 years ago. So I believe I have had an opportunity in my own lifetime to see the major developments of our present problems, although recognizing it is a very ancient problem.

Just to give a little indication of that, so that I can say a few things in a few words and have them accepted as having a background, I can recall the fact that nearly 30 years ago a brash young lawyer in Chicago wrote an article in a law review suggesting the imprisonment of criminal corporations as a means of breaking up such operations; and, at the suggestion of the then President Roosevelt, he discussed his idea with the Attorney General here in Washington; and just a few years later that same brash young lawyer drafted, with the aid of a rather distinguished committee of lawyers, a bill for a group of Members of Congress which was introduced to establish a Federal Trade Commission, and which set up the standards of unfair competition as a basis of Federal Trade Commission action which, after vigorous opposition when it was early brought forward, was adopted and put in the Federal Trade Commission bill, which was then enacted.

I might add merely as an ancient reminiscence that that same lawyer narrowly escaped, through senatorial courtesy, an appointment to the Federal Trade Commission in its early days.

I refer to these matters because I should not like my observations to appear as coming from a person who in the last 2 years of N. R. A. had had his first study and insight into the problems with which we are dealing. I might mention incidentally that in the 20 years prior to the inauguration of N. R. A. I happened to be personally engaged actively in the problems of public-utility regulation and labor regulation, which, as you all know, are rather closely akin to most of the problems we have had here in N. R. A.

Now, I want to go back for a moment to a book which was published in 1912. I am doing this because I wish to place the N. R. A. in your minds in its proper place in an historical development so that you will not see it as something either at the end or the beginning of the rainbow, as an isolated phenomenon, but so that you may see it as simply a part in a development which has been going on for so many years. I picked up this morning to refresh my recollection a book written by George Van Hise, then president of the University of Wisconsin in 1912, on Concentration and Control, a solution of the trust problem; and I want to read you one paragraph from the last pages of that book, where he says:

"In conclusion, there is presented, as the solution of the difficulties of the present industrial situation, concentration, cooperation, and control. Through concentration, we may have the economic advantages coming from a magnitude of operations. Through cooperation, we may limit the wastes of the competitive system. Through control by commission, we may secure freedom for fair competition, elimination of unfair practices, conservation of natural resources, fair wages, good social conditions, and reasonable prices."

That, as the matured thought of a distinguished scholar in the year 1912, indicates that the underlying problems of N. R. A. have been under consideration for quite some time before the N. R. A. developed.

All of us recognize, of course, that developments of transportation and communication, together with mechanization of production, have made the concentration of which President Van Hise spoke inevitable. The tendency toward mass production was first stimulated tremendously in this country during the war, the Civil War, then gained a new momentum before and again during the World War. Our problems have not developed out of wicked intention; out of malevolent or vicious purposes of groups of individuals; they developed out of the natural economic changes which bring about the necessity for new political handling.

With this audience I do not believe I need pay very much attention to describing the N. R. A.'s solution. That has been our breath of life for the last 2 years. We have probably all talked it back and forth so much that we are wearied with phrases that once had a great deal of meaning to us but now seem stale from mere repetition. But, avoiding the details, let me just state it in the fundamentals, because what I am coming to is the question of the future of N. R. A.

In fundamentals, what have we been trying to work out? We have been trying to work out mechanisms of cooperation, mechanisms of collective thinking and acting upon problems affecting multitudes, and problems in the end affecting all. We have been trying to work out techniques for using concerted action, not as an instrument of warfare between trade and industrial groups, or between enterprises, but trying to use a concert of action as a means of helping us do that which, willy-nilly, we must do in the long run; and that is, work together for the improved production and exchange of all the goods and products which we can produce and exchange.

Now, is there any question as to the validity of that program? Not the slightest.

Those who might wish to go far in the direction of what is sometimes called "the left" are merely seeking to accelerate and to concentrate that idea. They are merely seeking to leap over obstacles which will require long overcoming and to leap over gulfs that are a little beyond the leaping power of leadership. And those who would turn back and go toward what is sometimes called "the right" are simply asking for that temporary breathing space before the inevitable necessity of going forward again to meet the new conditions with new remedies.

My background, therefore, for the future of N. R. A., is that the future of that which we have been trying to do here for the last 2 years is just as sure and certain as the future of government itself. It is just as sure and certain that there must be devised improved mechanisms for rational control and intelligent direction of business operations, just as much as for the rational control and intelligent direction of political operations.

The idea that you can abandon effort at cooperation and improvements in self-discipline and social discipline simply assumes that you are to abandon the onward march of civilization. So what we should be considering today in a wholly sane world is merely the improvement of the administrative machinery, and not an attack upon a fundamental concept which is so obviously sound that only a confused and muddled mind could think of attacking it. I assume, therefore, that in the end sanity must prevail, unless we take the unhappy assumption of those who believe that the world is progressively moving toward insanity. I decline that assumption for the sake of my present sanity.

But when I listen to some of the suggestions which are made by the doctors gathered around the table and looking at the patient I am again reminded of a man who made a mistake by asking his small boy to listen in on the consultation of doctors after they left the sick chamber. The small boy came back to his father and said, "They talked such big words I couldn't understand them. All I remember is that the tall man with the black hair said, 'Well, I will tell you this; I'll bet I'll be proved right in the autopsy.'"

Those who are so anxious to see the N. R. A. left without the benefit of its gains of 2 years of experience, which certainly have given some idea of self-improvement, but desire it left just as it is, in order that the courts may have the opportunity to deal with it just as harshly as possible, remind me of the doctor who was betting he would be shown to be right in the autopsy.

The idea of N. R. A. is going ahead. The passage of one piece of legislation or another cannot affect the steady tendency, the trend of events, the force of economic and political changes that have brought us from the antitrust laws of 1890 to the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act in 1933. The tendency to go on is inevitable. One form or another of legislative sanction is inevitable. The action of the Federal Government to meet its responsibilities is inevitable. The sustaining of the authority of the Federal Government in the field committed to it by the Constitution is inevitable. I am not talking about the decision of any particular case.

But, as an organization, you may be acutely interested at the present time in the future of the N. R. A. as an organization. Far be it from me to attempt any prophecy along that line. But when even the staunchest opponents of the N. R. A., and those who would like to cut its throat, are finally convinced that it is necessary to at least advocate an extension for a period of time, even though it be an inadequate period, it seems to me it is not necessary for us to discuss, or consider, or worry about the technical question of the extension of N. R. A. We may be very deeply concerned with the form and time of extension, as to whether an adequate opportunity is given to this organization to carry forward in the light of its experience with the gains that it has made, whether it is going to have an adequate opportunity to do the kind of job that ought to be done, or whether it is going to be enmeshed in all the possible difficulties that can be placed in its way and then be asked in some way or other to perform the miracle of being a great success. But I am not interested at the moment, and I do not think you need be, in that question as to the immediate future of the N. R. A.

I think we should be profoundly interested in the question of at least having the ability to profit by our mistakes, to improve upon our performance, to contract our operations within human limits. We deluded ourselves for a year or so with the notion that perhaps we were a group of supermen who could work longer hours a day than any others, and think more rapidly. We might get over that. We have had such an intensive experience in the N. R. A. with problems with which others have had so much less experience in an intensive way that perhaps we have often been too impatient of the criticisms of the less informed individual, and forget two things—that perhaps after he got some further information he might agree with us, and second, that after we both got the same amount of information we might find we were wrong ourselves. And out of the intensity of our experience we did develop a certain impatience of the criticism of those who proceeded upon the basis of so much less experience in the precise problem.

Sometimes I think we have adopted unfortunately the attitude of the railroad section foreman who was cussing one of his gang, and who said, "I have taught him everything I know, but he don't know nuthin' yet."

We felt a little bit that way toward some of the people to whom we have tried to explain the beauty and the light of the processes we were engaged in. But I believe that this organization at the present time is entitled to feel two things. That is the particular reason I want to talk to you. First, a sense of permanence in the work in which we have been engaged. Regardless of temporary obstacles or difficulties, it is a great, permanent work. It is a work in which any contribution made is a contribution of long and lasting value, because you are working, and you have been working, in a great tide of human affairs, and in the direction of the tide, and not rowing against it.

One other point: This organization was gathered together hastily; a mass of volunteer workers were brought in. Men throughout the organization came to serve 3 months but remained a year; they came to serve 6 months but remained 2 years. There was a sense of impermanence in the organization itself. We were dealing with the heat of a great emergency, an emergency not entirely past but one greatly relieved, and for which we are entitled to take our share—not too great a share but a fair share of the credit.

Now, if the N. R. A. is to carry on a program of this long-term and lasting importance—and that is what it is—the inevitable program of developing necessary improved machineries of cooperation in the handling of trade and industry. If we are to play a part effectively in that work, the organization itself must grow into a sense of permanence. That is one of the primary reasons, I might say, for the complete folly of an extension for a few months. The men in the organization should feel that they are willing to come and that they will be welcome to stay for a period long enough in which to do a good job. It would be one of the most tragic things imaginable to Government and to business to lose the experience and benefit of this organization and its personnel in the handling of these problems.

Not everyone has been up to the same standard. The organization, like every organization, might be called "spotty." But on the whole there has been one characteristic of the entire organization which is worthy of the highest credit, and that is what I would call "loyalty." And by that I do not mean what is asked by many executives—loyalty to an individual. I do not mean that. And I do not mean that which a good many opinionated people love to term "loyalty to principle", which is merely loyalty to their own prejudices and preconceptions and their own pet ideas. What I mean is loyalty to an institution. And that is what makes human cooperation possible—loyalty to an institution, whether it be one of government or one of business.

Those who have been working in the N. R. A., to an extraordinary percentage, have been absolutely loyal to the N. R. A. as an institution. We might disagree on or we might not be loyal always to the same ideas or the same technique, but throughout the organization there has been a tremendous spirit of loyalty to the institution. And that has been priceless. And that is worthy and should be carried on. And to sacrifice either the institution or the loyalty to it would be a loss. A tragic amount of it is not yet appreciated by either business men or politicians.

If this organization can go forward as it should, there is one principle which should be added to the principle of permanence in the maintenance of this organization, and that should be the principle of promotion for merit. If you are going to build an organization to have a permanent value in the government structure, it should primarily be founded upon that principle, so that men can come into the ranks in humble capacities, can move forward as they develop their abilities, and can feel that they have ahead of them the prospect of really playing a great part in a great institution. That, again, is a reward and an incentive to loyalty to the institution itself.

What part I may personally play in the future development of N. R. A. is a matter of no importance in this connection. I am speaking only as one who has had 2 years of most intense experience, and who happens to have for the moment the responsibility of the chief executive position. And I am simply trying to speak out of my mind and heart my own feeling as to what we have been developing here and what should be carried on. And I hope that in what I have said I have found a response in the thought and purpose of the vast majority of those who have helped make what I regard as the great and extraordinary success of this new and far-flung effort to solve a very great and difficult problem.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, my only interest in Mr. Richberg is as a representative of the National Recovery Administration, the exponent of its principles and policy. I shall not criticize Mr. Richberg for alleged lobbying, because I recognize his right to state his views.

Permit me to say in passing that it seems to me we may well lay aside our troubles about lobbying. The citizens and the representatives of the departments of the Government have a perfect right to state their views, and to state them collectively or singly, and to come to Washington in order to state them if they so desire. It ought not to make any difference to a Senator as to the merits of a bill whether he is considering it while his constituents are present or while they are absent. If all the farmers were in favor of the A. A. A. amendments I would still have to oppose them and I would oppose in the interest of the farmer. But they have the right to urge their views. Therefore I do not rise to criticize what might be regarded as lobbying upon the part of anyone.

Mr. President, a few days since, the Senate passed a joint resolution extending the National Recovery Act to a certain time, and exempting from its operation during that time price fixing and control over intrastate commerce. The surprise to me has been that Mr. Richberg is apparently opposed to that joint resolution. I will say for myself that I consented not to oppose the resolution, not because it represented all that I desired, but because under the circumstances I thought that it was best for all that some sort of a compromise be brought about. I thought there was much in what the President had said that the termination of the National Recovery Act in a single instant and upon a certain day might be a very embarrassing and difficult thing to deal with. Besides the resolution would end two of the most objectionable features of the law. All in all, I finally got the consent of my mind to yield to the joint resolution so long as it exempted those two propositions from the operation of the National Recovery Act.

First was the question of price fixing, which I had understood was objectionable and coming to be very objectionable upon the part of the representatives of the National Recovery Administration, and particularly upon the part of Mr. Richberg himself. I recalled that in October of last year he made a speech on this subject which it occurred to me at the time was a most excellent statement, with reference to price fixing and the reduction of production.

I read from the Baltimore Sun of October 5, 1934:

"Rigid and sweeping price and production control is but an 'iridescent dream' in any but a socialistic state, and business men had better stop tinkering with it and get back to the 'sound competitive system' on which they were working." So counseled Donald R. Richberg today in his first public address since assuming directorship of the newly formed industrial emergency council, which is to fashion the future policies of the National Recovery Administration. He was speaking to the National Press Club.

Certainly, Mr. President, the resolution which we passed is not in contravention of the principle there announced. A person entertaining the views there expressed could hardly find any objection, it seems to me, to the joint resolution. Those of us who are opposed to the N. R. A. and do not believe in it in principle or philosophy might have gone much further and in going further would have better satisfied our own views. But if we are asked hereafter to recede from the position which we have taken we shall not advocate compromise measures, but precisely what we believe to be in the interest of the country.

Mr. Richberg said further:

The price-fixing and production-control problem had given the N. R. A. some of its most difficult experiences, and declared these troubles could not be blamed on "some Government theorist." On the contrary he said they were the result of pressure by business men themselves to experiment with devices they thought would do them good and which they have found out in many instances "are doing them harm."

Mr. Richberg said that in the face of a fundamental problem of socialistic economy—price and production control—the very business men who most abhor socialism seem to be determined to experiment with such devices, unconsciously developing through their trade associations—

"Unconsciously"? How gentle!

a sort of lopsided guild socialism. . . . They rush in where wiser opponents of state socialism fear to tread. How can individual freedom and the benefits of a competitive economy be retained if any organization (political or private) is authorized to dictate how much shall be produced and at what prices it shall be sold?

The "golden rulers" of industrial associations, invested with such political power, may easily become the "tyrannical bureaucrats" of tomorrow. Business men should be able to look ahead at least that far.

Mr. Richberg is quite right. That which was granted as a privilege or as a permission must soon crystallize into the absolute power to dictate the price which 120,000,000 people would have to pay for some indispensable article or product. It was at that that this joint resolution was striking—to take away from these combinations and corporations the power, even under the sheltering cover of the codes, to fix prices to the American people. If I may digress that is one reason why recovery has been retarded. It is because the power to fix prices retained in a few people the power to control all the benefits of recovery, and the money which should have gone out into the pockets of the great mass of the people and restored purchasing power to the great mass of the people was drawn back from the pockets of the many and placed in the pockets of the few.

The rejection and destruction of price fixing is not only essential to the permanency—if it is to be in any sense permanent—of the National Industrial Recovery Act, but it is absolutely essential to sound economy in the United States, and to the restoration of purchasing power to the great body of the people; no one stated it more forcefully, more effectively, or more soundly than Mr. Richberg stated it in his October speech in the middle of the last election.

Again, Mr. Richberg says:

Who can be intrusted with the power to fix a fair price that will insure justice to labor, investor, and consumer?

Who can be trusted with the power, public or private, to fix a price which will do justice to the consumer, to labor, and to the producer?

The answer is, No one; neither a private association nor a board of public officials.

How can individual freedom and the benefits of a competitive economy be retained if any organization (political or private) is authorized to dictate how much shall be produced and at what prices it shall be sold?

Those who vainly demand "freedom" from the antitrust laws and from all other social controls of business are engaged in fooling themselves with the hope of creating an irresponsible freedom for men to seek private profit without regard for the general welfare.

In other words, Mr. President, as I understood, the views of Mr. Richberg were that the price-fixing power, whether public or private, destroyed initiative, destroyed individuality, robbed the masses of that which they were entitled to have, kept down purchasing power, and retarded recovery in the United States; and so it does. If we are going to permit a dozen or two dozen corporations, having control of the great necessities and necessities of life, to fix the price which the countless thousands must pay, we can never restore purchasing power to the people. That was the trouble in 1929. We had had prosperity, comparatively speaking; we had had what the world called prosperity; but when the troubles of 1929 came, over 76,000,000 people of the United States had incomes of less than $500 a year because of the fact that the great corporations of the country were in control of the natural resources, of the sources of individual wealth, and of those things which the people had to have in order to live, and they were fixing prices, and drawing back from the common people all the possible gains that they could make from any source whatever—that has continued under the N. R. A. Their profits have even been increased, and Mr. Richberg upon the 5th of October condemned it. Why now should he turn about and condemn a joint resolution which kills price fixing?

I do not care anything about his philosophy or about his theory of social rehabilitation if it leaves out of his scheme the millions who must pay the prices which these corporations are establishing.

Mr. President, that was on the 5th day of October. On the 8th day of October there was recorded in the press dispatches the following:

Protests against abandonment of price and production controls of N. R. A. codes have mounted so high within the past week that the administration may be forced soon to clarify its intentions regarding them—

As stated by Mr. Richberg.

I see in the press, Mr. President, the statement that industries are coming here in a body to advise us as to our duty with reference to the extension of the N. R. A. The press ought not to say that they are coming. It should have said that they are remaining. They have been here all the time. Powerful influences fighting against the destruction of price fixing have been here, are here, and will continue to be here.

Do Senators suppose that when we have given men the power to fix prices—a power which the tsar of all the Russias never contemplated possessing—they are going to give it up without a struggle?

If you or I had the power to fix the price of some important article for 120,000,000 people, where would we be when a fight was on to take it off? We would be in Washington; and that is where these price fixers are. Let them come to Washington, and when they come let them disclose their profits under the N. R. A. and the exorbitant increase of prices, and they will supply some information which will reaffirm Mr. Richberg's view as to the viciousness of price fixing.

But a serious attempt to carry out the implied purpose of President Roosevelt and his chief recovery adviser, Donald R. Richberg, to modify these troublesome code sections, is thought likely to start General Johnson on the warpath against the revised N. R. A. The price and production problems were topmost on a list of pressing matters laid before the President today by the Industrial Recovery Board—

And so forth.

There is just one influence in the United States in favor of retaining price fixing, and that is the influence which has the power to fix prices. There is just one force fighting for price fixing, and that is the one which enjoys the benefit of price fixing. I venture to predict, Mr. President, that if the joint resolution which has passed the Senate shall fail, there will be a more determined effort to eliminate price fixing than the effort upon the part of Mr. Richberg after he heard other protests from business men.

That is one proposition which is in the joint resolution. The other proposition is to remove wholly intrastate commerce from the operation of the codes. That would free some 80 percent of small business. Mr. President, we have constitutional authority for that. We have the authority of Mr. Richberg for the removal of price fixing, and we have the authority of the Constitution for the removal of intrastate business—certainly two very respectable sources of authority justifying the joint resolution. Mr. Richberg knows perfectly well that without actual usurpation there can be no control of intrastate commerce by the Congress of the United States; and if he is opposed to the joint resolution in that respect, and desires to retain control of intrastate commerce, it must be upon the theory that he can usurp the power through some method or mode of regulation rather than following the Constitution. Price fixing, which the resolution eliminates, is unjust, and control over intrastate commerce which resolution would end is usurpation. Why should anyone object to such a resolution?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I do not wish to interrupt his train of thought if he prefers not to be interrupted.

Mr. BORAH. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to call the Senator's attention to a rather peculiar definition and construction of interstate and intrastate business which was developed by the testimony before the Finance Committee, and which gives an illustration of the very peculiar view of intrastate commerce and interstate commerce entertained by N. R. A. officials in some particulars.

We had before the committee a case where a man was engaged in the business of manufacturing ice in a small town in the interior of Florida. The testimony was to the effect, and the record showed, so far as the N. R. A. was concerned, that none of the products of the man's ice factory were sold outside the small community in which he was located; but the N. R. A. asserted and maintained, and undertook to get the Federal Trade Commission to hold, that the man was engaged in interstate commerce because a competitor, located some 8 or 10 miles away, did ice a railroad train which crossed a State line.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of course, rules and regulations can be made which will annoy an intrastate dealer into submission. I do not know, of course, that that is the program; but I do know that in the past people who were dealing with wholly intrastate matters have been repeatedly notified that they were subject to the control of the National Recovery Act and finally whipped into submission.

There can be no justification for objecting to removing intrastate business, unless it is proposed that that practice continue.

With reference to this matter of intrastate commerce, I shall not delay the consideration of the bill by going into a discussion of it today; but when the A. A. A. amendments come before the Senate, I think there will be justification for going into a discussion of it at some length. I shall not do so today.

Mr. President, we passed a joint resolution eliminating two propositions from the National Recovery Act, price fixing and intrastate business. I cannot understand upon what theory anyone should be in favor of retaining price fixing or the power to exercise an unconstitutional authority. I venture to advise those who oppose this resolution that no further concessions will be accepted.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I desire to address a question to the Senator from Idaho, if he will permit it. In connection with his denial of the jurisdiction of the Congress to legislate with the respect to intrastate business, I assume, of course, that the Senator from Idaho, with his wide knowledge of the decisions of the courts, would recognize that the Congress may deal with intrastate business in a case where such business burdens or affects interstate commerce. There is no contention upon that score, I assume.

Mr. BORAH. Not quite as the Senator states it. Congress may always deal with interstate commerce, and if, in the exercise of its power to regulate interstate commerce, it must deal with obstacles placed in the way of the exercise of that power by intrastate action, it may remove them.

Mr. STEIWER. I agree with the Senator's statement last made, and thank him for his categorical answer to my question. I detain the Senate merely long enough to make one observation with respect to it.

The poultry case, so called, is before the Supreme Court of the United States; the National Labor Relations Board bill is before the Senate today. Running throughout the pending legislative proposal, throughout the theory of the N. R. A., and throughout much other legislation which we have considered, and which we are bound to consider further, is the idea that Federal jurisdiction has attached to intrastate activities because in one way or another they affect or burden interstate commerce, or that character of commerce which the Constitution defines as commerce among the several States.

I take it from what the Senator from Idaho has said that he does not quarrel with the general rule; nor do I. I think it is perfectly clear, under the doctrine of the railroad rate cases, like the Minnesota case, and the Shreveport case, and the case involving interpretations of the Grain Futures Act, and other cases which the Supreme Court has decided the Congress does have jurisdiction to legislate with respect to certain intrastate activities when they are so interrelated with interstate activities that the regulation of the latter cannot be had without the regulation of the former, or in cases where the intrastate transactions burden the interstate commerce. I am personally willing to vote upon the pending bill, yet it has seemed to me that we are acting prematurely with respect to it. The question of jurisdiction of the subject matter of the bill apparently is intertwined most closely with the same question involved in the consideration of the National Recovery Act.

I favor the purposes of the pending labor disputes bill but I would feel freer in my consideration of the bill if the Supreme Court had already spoken and had defined more fully and with more particular reference to the thing that is now uppermost in the public mind the jurisdiction of the Congress to deal with various aspects of intrastate activity, which in many instances is not even commerce, but concerning which jurisdiction is claimed in the Congress because of some supposed relation to interstate commerce.

I say that because it is most apparent that one important thing for us to consider at this moment with respect to pending legislation is to determine where the constitutional jurisdiction of Congress begins and where it stops.

In making this statement I do not oppose what the Senator from Idaho just said in behalf of the joint resolution agreed to yesterday. I was in agreement with the position of the Senator from Idaho. I think he has very well stated today the argument in favor of the action taken by the Senate. It seemed to me then and seems now that there is no conceivable justification for the effort of Congress to take final action in connection with the National Recovery Act until the Supreme Court shall have defined the jurisdiction of the Congress to such an extent that we can say with certainty that we know our power and know that which is denied to us under the organic law of the country. In our haste to dispose of the pending labor legislation we invite troubles which will plague us later if the Supreme Court shall deny our jurisdiction to enter into the field of intrastate relationships.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho permit me to ask him a question in that connection? I do not wish to discuss the joint resolution we have passed; that is water over the dam, and I do not want to delay the bill now under consideration. But inasmuch as the power of Congress is under discussion, the subject having arisen on account of the discussion of Mr. Richberg, I observed this morning—and I do not know whether the Senator from Idaho was present in the Chamber or not—that in the Shreveport case the Supreme Court held that Congress was free, whenever it occupied the field of regulation, not only as to interstate carriers, but as to intrastate carriers where their practices and their rates and their policies operated as a burden on interstate commerce. In that decision the court held that not only did Congress have power to act, but that it was the duty of Congress to protect and promote interstate commerce against such practices as might be burdens on interstate commerce.

There is no difference between a carrier and the thing it carries under the commerce clause. The power to regulate commerce, insofar as it goes, extends to those who carry commerce as well as to the things which they carry. Does the Senator believe that the Court would likely render a different decision in determining the power of Congress to regulate the thing carried from the decision it rendered with reference to the thing that carries the article of commerce?

Mr. BORAH. If the Court were called upon to regulate the thing carried, and if, in regulating the thing carried, it necessarily came in contact with obstacles which had been placed there by intrastate commerce, it would render the same opinion, in my judgment, that it did render with reference to the instrumentality of carriage.

Mr. BARKLEY. It has been my feeling that the court would not differentiate between the thing carried and the carrier.

Mr. BORAH. I would think so. I merely wish to say this since the Shreveport case has been referred to very many times as announcing something in the nature of a departure from or widening of the construction of the commerce clause. In my opinion—and I will undertake to demonstrate its soundness in a few days—the Shreveport case announced no principle with reference to the construction of the commerce clause that is not found clearly announced in what is known as the "Steamboat case", or the case of Gibbons against Ogden, where the opinion was written by John Marshall in 1824. They held in that case, in the very beginning, in the first opinion ever handed down under the commerce clause, that the power of Congress over interstate commerce was full and complete, and that it might be exercised in order fully to protect interstate commerce as against any obstacle which a State might interpose.

In that case the State had granted a monopoly for steamboats upon the Hudson River, and it was claimed that the commerce was intrastate, and was therefore subject to the control of the State alone. But the Supreme Court in that case held that it was an obstacle, an intervention to the full exercise of the power to regulate commerce crossing boundary lines. I do not think the Shreveport case states any different principle.

SETTLEMENT OF LABOR DISPUTES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1958) to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, to diminish the causes of labor disputes, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I hope I will not be considered discourteous to my brethren, or out of order, if I offer a few remarks upon the question before the Senate. I approach the pending amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] and the other amendment to be offered later by him, and desire to discuss them together.

I realize that it is a difficult thing always to differentiate, when considering language proposed in a legislative measure, when we are trying to legislate and control the controversy that has always existed and still exists between capital and labor. I listened to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] with very deep interest. I thought he stated very fully and properly the purpose of the measure which is designed to cover a very difficult situation.

I admit that it would be very difficult to object to the amendment now pending, standing alone, if it affected legislation on a subject where normal conditions exist. At first blush the amendment seems to be absolutely fair, absolutely right, as a proposition of logic or of justice; and, weighed and applied to most of the ordinary affairs of life, there could be no objection to it. So I realize, to begin with, that it is very difficult for me to express in language really comprehensible by myself the real philosophy of the objection. I think, with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], that we cannot properly consider this question unless we consider it in the light of its history and in the light of the parties interested in the case, and their power.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Of course the fundamental difference which is arrived at immediately is that whatever coercion there is among employees is open and aboveboard; it can be seen and can be detected; but coercion exercised by an employer upon an employee is subtle, underground, economic, and the employer has power of this character over an employee which no employee has over another employee.

Mr. NORRIS. Again the Senator from Massachusetts has stated very effectively and concisely what I think is, in part, the real issue. On the one side is the employer, and on the other is the laboring man, the employee. One, the employer, has almost unlimited economic power in dealing with the other, the employee. The employee has no economic power. The employer holds in his hand the welfare, perhaps even the right to live, not only of the employee but of his family. His economic power can be enforced, as the Senator from Massachusetts has well said, through channels and by means often almost impossible, if not absolutely impossible, to detect. He has many methods of exercising his economic power. The employee has none. Again, the employer's economic situation is not so precarious as that of the employee. He often has other means of living, other means of making money, other means of going on if his business should be closed up. That is not always true of the employee. It may sometimes be true but ordinarily the employee has no other means of livelihood, no other means of supporting his family, his wife, and his children, of clothing them and of feeding them, than what he gets from his employment. He is, therefore, almost helpless in the economic situation when he runs up against the employer.

That is not all, Mr. President. We ought to consider this amendment in the light of history running back a great many years. I did not know this question was going to arise or that I was going to make any remarks on it today. Had I known that I should have attempted to prepare myself with some citations and with some of the history of injunction proceedings which have been had for many years between capital and labor. I can only refer to that history in a general way, as I remember it, in view of the fact that I have not studied it for a year or two past.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I agree with what the Senator from Nebraska has said, and I can sympathize with his desire to protect the laboring man from interpretations of the law which would be injurious when no injury is intended; but I say with all deference to the Senator from Nebraska that, in my judgment—and I am probably wrong; but, at least, it is my view—we are debating something which I have not been able to explain to the Senate, at least as I see it. If the Senator will bear with me, I shall try to make my position clear.

As the section now reads, it simply says:

Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities, for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

Let us suppose that was all there was to it. I do not desire to take that right away from the employees. I do not desire to put language in the bill which may be interpreted as weakening the language already in the bill; but, in order that the employees shall have the right which is provided in the bill, my amendment stipulates that, without any coercion, without any intimidation, they "shall have the right to self-organization, to form, to join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining", and the like. The amendment explicitly provides that in the enjoyment of such right nobody shall coerce or intimidate them.

I probably do not have a clear conception of the issue, but it seems to me that my amendment clarifies the rights of labor.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator may be right, of course. I have no idea but that his object is to clarify and that he has not any object which is detrimental to a condition which we all agree ought to exist. If there did not recur to me what I have learned of the injunction question from my study of it extending over quite a number of years, if I did not remember the hearings in which I have listened to presentations on both side for months, if I had not had that experience, and if I had not the ideas which are now back in my brain which were pounded into me during long and tedious debates, I should jump to the conclusion at once, and say there is no possible objection to the Senator's amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Unfortunately, the Department of Labor, the members of the National Labor Relations Board, and representatives of organized labor do not think the proposed language clarifies the bill, but rather that it destroys the effective purpose of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree to that statement.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I wish to ask the Senator a question.

I am slightly familiar with the situation he is presenting, namely, that coercion clauses and intimidation clauses, so to speak, have been used against labor rather than for the protection of labor. I am familiar with that particular subject in a general way, though not profoundly so; but it strikes me—I may be wrong about it—that the way those clauses are used in this particular connection is not the way in which they have been used, concerning which the Senator is speaking. It seems to me that such clauses have not been used to further collective bargaining, but have heretofore been employed to prevent the use of collective bargaining, to coerce or intimidate anyone; whereas I propose by my amendment to protect collective bargaining from intimidation and coercion.

Do I make myself clear to the Senator?

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator does.

I will say, Mr. President, that when I was first interrupted by the Senator from Maryland I was about to take up the review, in a very brief way, of the history of the injunction process between capital and labor, which, I think, has a direct bearing on the construction of the words of this amendment; and I think my discussion of the question will be an answer, so far as I am able to give an answer, to some of the questions propounded by the Senator from Maryland.

First, the Sherman antitrust law was passed at a time when none of us was in the Senate. No one thought there was a labor question involved in it. The idea of the law was to protect persons in their business, and prevent business from being handicapped by unjust and unfair methods of competition. But, as it developed, the Sherman Antitrust Law became a weapon by which labor was almost crushed out of existence because of the construction placed upon the law by the courts.

We passed the Clayton antitrust law amendatory to the Sherman antitrust law. The Clayton antitrust law was passed during the official lives of some of us who are now here. That law was held by many persons to be a new charter of freedom for labor. However, it did not do labor that much good. The constructions which were put on that law by the courts from time to time practically took away all its force and effect.

In the hearings, which went on for 3 years or so, during all of which I had the honor to preside, and in which I heard every word of the testimony, the history of these injunction suits was given, and the opinions of the courts were presented, showing that there was a gradual movement toward the domination of capital over labor. It then seemed to me, and I think those who studied the question were convinced, that on account of the existence and exercise of the economic power of which I spoke awhile ago, Congress was justified in putting forth its strong arm again to see if it could not protect labor, and we passed the anti-injunction bill.

There was not very much consideration on the floor of the Senate, but before the committee the hearings during that time lasted for over 2 or 3 years. The thing that brought about the changes of which I have spoken was, in the main, the issuance of injunctions by the courts, giving a different construction to the laws, I believe, from that which was intended to be given to them by those who enacted the laws. After all, the courts are going to construe this measure, if it shall become a law, and when they get through with it, as often happens, we may not know our own child. We are, to a great extent, a country controlled and governed by injunctions. One man sitting as a district judge can nullify, by a stroke of the pen, the acts of the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives, even though their action be unanimous.

The history of these injunctions shows that the general trend was to construe the laws as capital wanted them to be construed. I have now in mind an injunction issued by a district judge in the case of a strike in which injunction it was specifically stated, in so many words, that every one of the employees was enjoined from telling anybody that there was even a strike on at a certain mill. A laboring man in that mill violated the injunction if he told his wife the next morning why he did not go to work. Was there anything in the law that justified such an injunction? As I see it, I do not think there was. Congress thought that it had obviated such a thing as that when it passed these different laws, but, in view of the way the courts construed them, it had not done so.

Other injunctions enjoined not only the laborers but the entire public from contributing any money to the support of a laboring man who was on a strike. They enjoined a doctor from giving him medical attention, a lawyer from giving him legal advice as to what his rights were in that very case.

A laborer had no right, under the injunction, to consult an attorney. A coal dealer had no right to sell one of them coal.

The court enjoined the laborers from appealing a case where the employer had commenced an action of forcible detainer to put them out of the shanties which the employers call houses and sometimes even stretch the word so far as to call them homes. It enjoined anybody from furnishing him a bond in case he was dissatisfied with the action of the lower court and desired to carry it up to the higher court, in which case, under the law, he had to give a bond, if he took it up, to pay a reasonable price for rent while the appeal was pending. That was enjoined. The law of the State provided that if a man was living on a rental basis in a house which somebody else owned, if the owner wanted to put him out, and claimed there was a violation of the tenant's contract, he could sue out a writ in a justice-of-the-peace court, and if the justice decided against the laboring man or any other man, whoever he might be, he had a right to appeal the case to a higher court, but in order to do so the tenant had to give a bond that he would pay the rent on the house during all the time he occupied the premises. So there could be no possible loss on the part of the big corporation that owned the little shanty. Yet the courts have enjoined—there are actual cases that can be found in the books if Senators will examine them—anybody from furnishing a laboring man a bond to enable him to go up to a higher court. The facts in some of those cases show that the friends of the laboring man were ready with the bond; that there was no question about its sufficiency, but they were enjoined from furnishing it. The laboring men could not dare ask a lawyer what their rights were. That was contrary to the injunction.

They were prohibited from making speeches or telling anyone else anything that happened. The result was that some of these men, without jobs, wandering around on the streets, and without the ability to tell anybody what was the matter, became almost crazy, wild. You can imagine, Mr. President, what kind of feeling that would engender in the heart of a man.

Suppose the pending amendment were agreed to and some laboring man should meet some other laboring man and say to him, "I should like to have you strike", or "I should like to have you join my union", what would there be to hinder one of the courts holding that that was coercion and issuing an injunction in such a case? "You may not coerce." I would not think such an act was coercion; the Senator from Maryland would not think it was coercion, of course; we would not have agreed, either one of us, with the construction placed by courts on the various acts that Congress has passed.

If it were an ordinary case, I would not hesitate to say that I would accept the amendment, but when I remember that in these great controversies which are so one-sided, and where the employer has countless ways by which he can coerce if he wants to, without anybody even finding it out, I have no doubt that the amendment ought to be rejected.

I do not want to be understood as saying that the amendment is not offered in good faith; I believe it is. I am not questioning the good faith of the Senator from Maryland or of anyone else who supports the amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. In the case the Senator has been using as an illustration, did the law, as it then existed, provide in effect that the employees should have the right to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, without coercion or intimidation from anyone?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I will say to my friend, I do not think it did. I am not trying to state the law. These statutes were enacted years ago; I am not claiming the law was the same then as it is now; but I am trying to illustrate how easy it is for a judge who is friendly to capital and opposed to labor to render a decision by which he will make the laboring man absolutely helpless. That is all I am trying to do.

Mr. TYDINGS. I sympathize with the Senator's philosophy in that respect, and it is my own. I want laboring men to have the right to bargain collectively, and so on, without interference or coercion; but, if the Senator will permit me—and I do not want to appear impertinent—it strikes me that this amendment is clearly without the purview of the decisions referred to by the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator, I will not quarrel with him about that; I agree to that; but I do not want some judge who may not agree with us to use it as a leverage by which to issue an injunction against some poor fellow who is helpless.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think I see the Senator's viewpoint; but I am not altogether clear, because it is difficult to understand whether he sees mine. As I understand these words, if they are not put in the bill the right of collective bargaining exists, and if they are put in the bill it not only exists but no one may coerce or intimidate anyone in an attempt to take it away. It strikes me that is the only thing before us.

Mr. NORRIS. If I knew the Senator from Maryland were going to be the judge every time such a question came before the court, I would not object to the amendment. If we were sure of having such a judge as he, it would not be necessary to have the pending bill here; it would not be necessary to have other laws. A great deal of our time has been taken up in order to meet the construction that may be put upon our action by the courts.

We realize when we pass a law that we do not know whether or not it is a law, even after the Senate and House have passed it and the President has signed it, for some judge in Maine or California or Florida may have a different opinion from the 532 men who enacted the law, and the judge may say, "You ought not to have passed it; I will issue an injunction to restrain its enforcement." I do not mean that as a criticism of the courts in general, because I think, as a rule, they embrace the highest class of men in the United States; but, as in the case of Senators and Members of the House—they are not all of that kind; they are like any other group of people.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I ask the Senator, in view of his study of this question and his experiences with respect to the manner in which courts have handled these problems, if it is not quite probable, and perhaps most likely, that courts would construe the efforts of one employee to get his fellow employees to organize a union to be coercion?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. In other words, what this amendment, if adopted, will do will be to make a police court out of the board instead of a regulatory body dealing with regulations as to collective bargaining between employers and employees. There is a police court to handle cases of threats, assaults, and attempted murder on the part of one employee against another.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in conclusion, I wish to say that, in my judgment, we will run a great risk of making loopholes by putting in modifications of some of the powers which are granted in this bill, even though we do it with the intention of making it more explicit than it previously was.

I am expecting great results from this legislation if it is finally enacted. I sympathize with the objects to be attained. I do not want to take any chance of nullifying them by bringing forth decisions from courts which would undo a great deal of the good we had hoped to accomplish. Therefore, out of an abundance of caution, which may not be justified—perhaps, because of my own experience and study of the question, I may have been led too far one way—I cannot resist reaching the conclusions I have tried to state here to the Senate. I know I had no prejudice in the beginning and I hope I have none now. I have none that I know of. I am not aware of it if I have any.

The employer will not be troubled. Do not get the idea that we ought to go out and put safeguards around him; he has always taken care of himself thus far; but we should help the man down in the street who is helpless, who has to eat out of the hand of the other man sometimes, has to do what he tells him he wants done, even though the orders are conveyed to him by indirect means where he cannot directly trace the voice or the hand of his economic master. It is an unjust contest with all the power on the one side and no power on the other.

It seems to me under those circumstances that we ought to reject the amendments of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I have before me the Norris Anti-Injunction Act, which I had the pleasure of supporting and discussing when it was before the Senate. At that time I recall the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] called attention to court interpretations with respect to the right of workers to organize and to prosecute strikes which they thought were justified. It was brought to the attention of the Senate that threats to strike had in many jurisdictions been regarded by the courts as coercive acts. A refusal to work on material of nonunion manufacture had been decided by a court to be a form of coercion. Even peaceful persuasion by picketing was regarded in some jurisdictions as a coercive method employed by labor against the employer. It was court interpretation of this type which brought about the passage of the Norris Anti-Injunction Act, designed to limit the abuse of the injunction in labor disputes.

I agree with the Senator from Nebraska that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] is absolutely sincere in offering his amendment. But I want to state that probably I know a little more about the efforts to procure this amendment to the proposed legislation than does the Senator from Maryland. For, in my judgment, if we should adopt this amendment, it would practically nullify the effect of the Norris Anti-Injunction Act and would revive the procedure of restraining employees from indulging in normal organizing activities in their relationship with one another.

The whole philosophy of this legislation is to deal with the relationship between employees and employers. For 100 years it has been agreed that the workers of the country should have the right to organize. They were never able to exercise that right because of the economic control of the employer, which enabled him always to thwart the attempts of workers.

This bill was prompted by the desire to have more than a mere reiteration of our constant declaration that the workers shall have the right to organize, more than abstract freedom not protected by law. It proposes that hereafter the employer shall not interfere with employees in their right of organization.

So far as coercion by employees is concerned, the Senator from Maryland need not be concerned, because there is abundant law today to take care of the things about which the Senator is apprehensive. The Senator spoke of intimidation. Under the Norris Anti-Injunction Act, intimidations and threats may now be enjoined by the courts.

I appeal to the Senators that if the amendment is inserted in the bill it will repeal all the salutary features of the Norris Anti-Injunction Act. When workers attempt to organize and a threat of strike results, or when banners are displayed asking workers to join a certain organization, or when workers refuse to work upon material which comes from a nonunion factory, these acts which we thought we had protected by the Norris Act would again fall under the equity jurisdiction of the courts. This would in large measure frustrate and paralyze the efforts of the workers of the country to exercise rights which for 100 years have been recognized verbally.

That is my fear. When the suggestion was first made to me that these additional words should be included in the bill, I had the same experience that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] had. I, too, felt no objection to the words until, like him, I went to the law library and began to study the old cases and the history behind the anti-injunction legislation introduced and sponsored by the Senator from Nebraska. Then I saw that the workers of the country were being deprived, through the economic pressure of employers, of the power to form organizations. It would be better off to have no law at all than to make this legislation a vehicle for the revival of the labor injunction. That is why I am sure that if the Senator from Maryland had studied the cases involving the misuse of the word "coercion" he would withdraw his amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. I dislike to be perpetually in these minorities—and I say this without reflecting on anyone—but I remember that about 2 years ago, when the N. R. A. bill was introduced, it was almost treason to oppose it, particularly on this side of the aisle. I certainly received my share of abuse for not voting for it. It was to be the panacea which was to solve all our ills. Now everybody has awakened to the fact that it was perhaps the greatest price-fixing proposal ever passed by Congress. So, therefore, what appears to be all lovely and useful to humanity quite often, when it is applied, is not so useful.

I do not think that a single argument has been made against this amendment which is apropos of its written language. We are not arguing here, and there are not involved in this case, the subjects covered in the anti-injunction cases. We are now engaged in making affirmative law. We are giving to labor affirmative rights which theoretically, at least, it did not have before. We are making them clear and unrestricted, and bringing them out in the light of day. If it weakens those rights to say that labor shall have them without coercion or intimidation, then I say all lawmaking is useless, and words do not mean what they seem to mean.

Let me read the section as proposed to be amended. What would the proposed law provide if the amendment were adopted?

Employees shall have the right—

There is no word about employers here. There is nothing about employers. This section tells what rights employees shall have.

Employees shall have the right to self-organization—

In effect, my amendment says:

without coercion or intimidation.

Employees shall have the right to form, join, or assist labor organizations without coercion or intimidation.

Employees shall have the right to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing without intimidation or coercion.

Employees shall have the right of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection without coercion or intimidation.

In other words, it is held here that the mere insertion of the words "without coercion or intimidation" would weaken the right of labor rather than strengthen it.

If labor has these rights, and we provide that it shall not be coerced or intimidated in exercising them, it certainly seems to me we thereby strengthen those rights, make them mandatory, and prevent the employer on the one hand, and extraneous influences on the other hand, from transgressing on the rights which Congress wishes to give labor.

In conclusion, with all due respect to the learned Senators who have taken the opposite view on the floor of the Senate, the so-called "parallel" which they have set up in relation to this section is not a parallel at all. They have been arguing an entirely different case. They have been arguing the intangible or indirect effect of collective bargaining, and not the mandatory, congressionally affirmed effect of collective bargaining without coercion or intimidation.

I realize the viewpoint of my friend from New York. I appreciate his fear; but I desire to say that I do not agree with the point of view he expresses. As I see this particular section, it looks to me like an effort to force every man in America to join a certain kind of union, whether or not he wishes to join that union; and the coercion and intimidation features are not to be inserted in this section because a certain union desires a free hand to take the workers from the groups in which they now belong into groups into which they may not wish to go.

That is the naked fact back of the opposition to this amendment. It is an amendment to force all working people into a particular union, and every Senator on this floor knows that to be the truth.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware has the floor.

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. I am not going even to allude to the last statement of the Senator from Maryland; but this is not the first time that this subject has been up for consideration by the Senate.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true.

Mr. WAGNER. When the anti-injunction bill, to which I referred a moment ago, was up for consideration, I remember that there was a proposal to include prohibitions against employees such as the Senator from Maryland now proposes. But it was not accepted, because it came from those not friendly to the legislation.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; but why not provide also that he shall be free from other coercion?

Mr. WAGNER. Last year we passed by unanimous vote in both Houses the amendments to the Railway Labor Act, enumerating practically the same unfair labor practices as the pending bill. The same proposal came up before the committee considering that measure and was rejected by a unanimous vote, because the committee saw the dangers of it.

The Senator is not up to date on precedent.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from New York to that to which he has already referred with reference to the public policy of the United States as stated in the Norris-LaGuardia Act, the anti-injunction act:

Whereas under prevailing economic conditions, developed with the aid of governmental authority for owners of property to organize in the corporate and other forms of ownership association, the individual unorganized worker is—the individual unorganized worker is commonly helpless to exercise actual liberty of contract and to protect his freedom of labor, and thereby to obtain acceptable terms and conditions of employment, wherefore, though he should be free to decline to associate with his fellows, it is necessary that he have full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of his own choosing, to negotiate the terms and conditions of his employment, and that he shall be free from the interference, restraint, or coercion of employers of labor, or their agents, in the designation of such representatives or in self-organization or in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection; therefore, the following definitions of, and limitations upon, the jurisdiction and authority of the courts of the United States are hereby enacted.

I desire to emphasize those words:

I desire to call the attention of the Senator from New York to what I am about to state, and to see if it be true: As I read this measure, as late as 1932 the Congress declared it to be the public policy of the United States, first, that the individual worker is entitled to actual liberty of contract, and to the protection of his freedom to labor. Is that true in the present bill?

Mr. WAGNER. That is true in the present bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. What happens under this bill to the worker who is in the minority? Has he any freedom left? Is he not compelled to do what somebody else asks him to do, and is not his freedom destroyed to that extent?

Before the Senator answers that question, I desire to ask him another question along the same line.

Is it not true that the individual worker should be free to decline association with his fellows? Can that be true under this bill? Under the act from which I have read, the declaration of Congress was that the individual worker is entitled to "full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of his own choosing, to negotiate the terms and conditions of his employment." Those things were assured to the worker. That was the declaration of the Congress; but what I am concerned about, and what I desire the Senator from New York to explain to me, is, in what condition do we find the worker who is in the minority?

There may be 2,000 employees in one establishment, and there may be 1,100 of them who want to do a certain thing. If the Board describes them as a proper unit for that particular establishment, that means that the 900 will either have to go along with the 1,100, or they will lose their positions.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MALONEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WALSH. In what respect does the Senator think the right of any minority of employees is affected by this bill?

Mr. HASTINGS. If that is not true, then I have misread the bill. Does not the bill specifically provide that a majority of the various units that are to be set up and authorized by the board are to be in control, so far as wages and other important things are concerned, with respect to the worker?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, under this bill representatives chosen by a majority of the workers in a particular unit are recognized as entitled to represent the workers in that unit for the purpose of collective bargaining with the employer, following a similar provision in the Railway Labor Act. It would be obviously impracticable to have two collective agreements, with differing terms as to wages and conditions of employment, covering the same categories of workers in an appropriate unit. Who, then, should represent the employees in negotiating the agreement? Obviously, the representatives chosen by the majority of the workers in the unit affected, in accordance with democratic principles; otherwise the employer will be enabled to profit by exploiting a division in the ranks of the workers, by playing off one group against another in the negotiations, and thus defeating true collective bargaining. Minority groups and individuals are permitted by the bill to present grievances to the employer. But any agreement arrived at with the majority representatives necessarily is applicable to all the workers in the unit. If a dissenting minority do not like the terms of the agreement, there is nothing in the bill which prevents the minority from quitting or striking.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the Senator be good enough to tell me what section that is?

Mr. WALSH. It is the theory of the whole bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. The theory, but I want to find out what is actually provided.

Mr. WALSH. It provides for elections.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the Senator know what section it is?

Mr. WALSH. Section 9 gives the board power to conduct elections, and declare who are the majority representatives, and then provides that such representatives shall be the collective-bargaining agency for all the workers in the unit. That is what the election is held to determine.

Mr. HASTINGS. Let me read to the Senate what section 9 provides:

Representatives designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit.

If I understand the bill, a unit does not necessarily mean the employees of a certain corporation, but the unit may be a unit of employees scattered all over this country, and if a majority of that unit decides on a certain thing, then the majority of that unit can make a bargain for the employees of a certain corporation where none of them want that particular thing.

Mr. WALSH. The appropriate unit depends so much upon the facts of the particular case that necessarily the Board must determine the unit, as is also provided in the Railway Labor Act. But, as I have said, a minority group is not bound by the agreement negotiated, that is, they are free to quit or strike. For that matter, nothing in the bill prevents the majority from striking, though the testimony before our committee indicated that unions have had a generally good record in abiding by agreements.

Mr. HASTINGS. What is a bargain if it does not bind anybody?

Mr. WALSH. There is nothing in the bill to prevent strikes. We cannot stop that. No legislation can. What this bill does is to seek to prevent strikes brought on as a result of the employer refusing to recognize and bargain collectively with the properly designated representatives of his employees.

Mr. HASTINGS. Let me read this to the Senator from Massachusetts and see how nearly we agree on it.

Section 9 (a). Representatives designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes.

And those units are fixed by the board, as I understand it, or are approved by the board; and, as I have said, a unit may be scattered all over the country and a majority of the employees control.

Shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining.

Mr. WALSH. The representatives chosen by the majority shall be the collective bargaining agency for the employees in the unit. As I have said, the making of the bargain does not prevent even the majority from striking. We cannot pass laws to compel a man to be a slave. Even after he makes an agreement he can say, "I do not want to work."

The trouble with the Senator is that he has the idea that a dissenting employee in the unit covered by the agreement would be forced in an employment the terms of which may have become distasteful to him. Not by any means. It only leads the employees to the door of the employer and states, "These are the representatives chosen by a majority of the workers and you should bargain with them." That is all it does.

Mr. HASTINGS. Let me read a little further and show what it provides:

SEC. 9. (a) Representatives designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes, shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment.

Mr. WALSH rose.

Mr. HASTINGS. Just a moment. Let me point out what rights the minority have.

Provided, That any individual employee or group of employees shall have the right at any time to present grievances to their employer.

That is all the right the minority have. The majority have a right to make a bargain with respect to wages, hours of employment or other conditions of employment, but the minority have the right only as individuals or a group of employees at any time to present grievances to their employer.

Let me place before the Senate my own idea about it and let the Senator correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator permit me to say one word?

Mr. HASTINGS. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. All the section does is to designate the agency to negotiate on behalf of the employees, with whom the employer must deal. He does not have to accept any particular contract with them, but he must bargain with them in a bona fide effort to reach a mutually satisfactory agreement.

Mr. HASTINGS. Let me take the case of an automobile manufacturer having 2,000 employees, who have any kind of an organization they want. I do not care whether it is a labor union or what not, but we will suppose there is a unit in that particular corporation in a particular plant. They want someone to represent them, and 1,100 of them want a certain group or a certain person to represent them, to go to their employer and see if they can make an agreement. There is a vote on that question, the representatives are named, and they go and discuss with their employer what the trouble is with respect to this labor dispute, and they reach an agreement. They agree, let us suppose, for a year or for 6 months or for 2 years that these shall be the conditions of employment in this factory.

Certainly if there be anything in this bill that is worth while at all, that agreement must be binding upon the people who are represented on both sides, or it does not amount to anything.

What I ask the Senator—and what I want to call attention to—is, What is to become of the individual rights and the individual freedom of the 900 people who do not like the bargain that has been made? What happens to them? They either have to go along with the 1,100, or they have to be discharged by the employer, because in this bill there is a provision that the 1,100 can make their bargain with the employer.

"This agreement we make with you, we representing the employees and you the employer. The agreement we make with you is that every person employed in this factory shall belong to this union to which the 1,100 of us belong. Unless you make this bargain with us we are going to walk out. If you do make the bargain with us, 1,100 of us at least are going to stay."

That leaves the 900 in that factory with no place to go except out in the cold or agree to what has been proposed to them by the representatives of the 1,100. Is that true or not? That is what I should like to find out.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator made so many assertions in connection with his question that it is difficult to answer it. The trouble with the Senator is that he thinks this proposed legislation goes to the extent of compelling an agreement between an employer and the representatives of the employees.

Mr. HASTINGS. No; that is not correct.

Mr. WALSH. It does not do that.

Mr. HASTINGS. I agree to that.

Mr. WALSH. All the bill does is, for the sake of peace and harmony, for the sake of bringing employers and employees together, to lay the foundation of machinery for getting a proper representation of employees at the door of the employer to discuss and argue out their difficulties. That is all it does. An agreement arrived at with the representatives chosen by a majority has the best chance of achieving general acceptance, and thus stabilizing employment relations and promoting peace.

Mr. HASTINGS. Under the bill, who would represent the 900 employees?

Mr. WALSH. The wise employer will learn the sentiments of all groups among his employees, that is not denied. But the negotiation of the collective agreement must be with the majority representatives. No one can compel him to put his name and pen to any particular agreement of any shape or form under this bill any more than now. Now, the employees can say, "Unless you do this we will strike", and they may strike. Under this bill they can do that. We do not enter that domain. The majority rule is best illustrated by the fact that the Senator is here representing a majority of the people of Delaware. He speaks for them. That does not mean that the minority cannot protest by their vote. That does not mean that the minority cannot criticize. That does not mean that the minority cannot see fit to attempt to make a change at the next election. All those rights these employees have. The minority need not continue in employment under the terms of the collective agreement.

Mr. HASTINGS. They either are bound or they may have to walk out.

Mr. WALSH. That is true now. Lay this bill aside now, and any number of employees may go to an employer and make demands, and if he does not meet them they can walk out.

Mr. HASTINGS. I thought the attempt was to cure the present situation.

Mr. WALSH. We are curing it. We are requiring employers to negotiate with the properly designated representatives of their employees, in the hope of having peace, in the hope of removing misunderstanding, not for the purpose of taking rights away from either party.

Mr. President, there are some fundamental rights an employer has, just as there are rights an employee has. No one can compel an employer to keep his factory open. No one can compel an employer to pay any particular wage. No one can compel an employer to hire others in addition to those he sees fit to hire. So with an employee; no one can compel him to work, no one can compel him to go on strike, no one can compel him to leave his work.

No one can keep an employer from closing down his factory and putting thousands of men and women on the street. So in dealing with this bill we have to recognize those fundamental things, and we have not gone into that domain. All we do is to remove the barriers that have kept employees away from their employers, which have prevented collective bargaining, which have resulted in strikes without any attempt to negotiate. All we have done is to promote the orderly processes of collective bargaining.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator is concerned with what happens to the minority. Under this proposed legislation, assuming an agreement has been consummated by the agency elected by the majority of the employees, there will be no advantage which a majority can have under an agreement to which the minority is not also entitled, and in order to have that advantage the minority need not join any organization. It can join or not join, either way. It cannot be discriminated against under any other provision of the law.

Mr. HASTINGS. Let me call the attention of the Senator from New York to this provision in section 8, paragraph (3), at the bottom of page 10:

It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

That language begins section 10, and then I read subparagraph (3)—

by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization—

It is declared to be an unfair labor practice for an employer to do that.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then the subparagraph continues:

Provided, That nothing in this act, or in the National Industrial Recovery Act as amended from time to time, or in any code or agreement approved or prescribed thereunder, or in any other statute of the United States, shall preclude an employer from making an agreement with a labor organization (not established, maintained, or assisted by any action defined in this act as an unfair labor practice) to require as a condition of employment membership therein, if such labor organization is the representative of the employees as provided in section 9 (a)—

Namely, a majority—

in the appropriate collective bargaining unit covered by such agreement when made.

That is the reverse, as I understand, of the "yellow dog" contract which has been so roundly and properly condemned in this body.

Mr. WAGNER. No, Mr. President; the Senator apparently does not understand that provision. It does no more than to legalize a closed-shop agreement, which is a matter of agreement between employer and employees where it is now sustained by the public opinion of the State.

Mr. HASTINGS. This language is perfectly clear. Does it not say, in so many words, that if the employer so desires, and the majority of the labor union so desires, they may make an agreement whereby no one may be employed in the establishment unless he belongs to that union, and will not that provision in this bill compel a minority of employees in that particular shop or that particular unit to join that union, whether they wish to or not, and pay all the fees which the union may desire to charge?

Mr. WAGNER. The provision will not change the status quo. That is the law today; and wherever it is the law today that a closed-shop agreement can be made, it will continue to be the law. By this bill we do not change that situation. Closed-shop agreements are made all over the country, and they are matters of agreement. The question of compulsion is not involved in them. Closed-shop agreements are very well known in this country, and they are mere matters of agreement.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator's last question, I will say that I think we all agree with the definition of an unfair practice given under subparagraph (3), namely:

It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

(3) By discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization.

That, standing alone, would make an employer commit an unfair labor practice if he required his employee to be a member of a union. The Senator understands that, of course. The reason why an exception has been made to the rule is that there are already contracts existing, permitted and authorized by certain States, permitting employers to make contracts with employees limiting their personnel to the members of a particular union.

That practice is quite common among the plasterers and the bricklayers and other masons. All this bill says is that no employer may discriminate in hiring a man, whether he belongs to a union or not, and without regard to what union he belongs; but if an employer wishes to agree and to make a contract of his own volition with his employees to hire only members of a company union or of a trade union, he can do so.

The provision in the bill makes it possible for an employer to say, "I will hire only company union men"; but the agreement must be voluntarily entered into and not forced upon him. Or he can say, "I will hire, as I do now and as the unions exist now, only members of trade unions."

In other words, if there were not this exception, what we should do by this bill would be merely to pass a law allowing closed shops. However, it is provided that the employer must give his consent. Even though nine-tenths of his men insist on their demands, the agreement must be voluntary, and it can be made only if he voluntarily gives consent.

Mr. HASTINGS. What does the Senator mean by saying that the employer must give his consent? If 51 percent of his employees demand a certain thing, is he not obliged to consent or have a strike on his hands?

Mr. WALSH. He certainly does not have to consent.

Mr. HASTINGS. What is he going to do about it after this bill is passed?

Mr. WALSH. What can he do now, if 51 percent of his employees come to him now and say, "We want this right, and if you do not give it to us we will strike"? This bill does not change that situation. I have repeated that again and again. This bill leaves it up to the representatives of his workers, with the hope, if they have been honestly selected by secret ballot, that they will say, "We shall present our grievances and endeavor to settle some of these disputes." There will be a settlement of some, but not a settlement of all. At least, those men will be the legal representatives of the workers whom the National Labor Relations Board will recognize, and the employer will know that he is dealing with what appears to be, under the law of the land, a recognized majority representative of his own employees.

This bill will not stop all strikes, though it will prevent some strikes. It will, however, stop many, many misunderstandings. At least, it will invite and encourage representatives of employees to meet with their employers and try to settle their disputes. It will prevent being done some of the things which were done in the past. This bill, however, will not settle all strikes, nor is it expected that it will make a police court out of the board, as the Senator from Maryland apparently wishes it to do.

Do Senators realize what the Senator's amendment means? If his amendment were adopted, the board would be flooded with complaints from employees saying, "I was coerced by this other employee." "I was coerced by so-and-so." "I was coerced by such-and-such an employee." The whole purpose and object of this bill would be destroyed, namely, to have peaceful elections, honest elections, and representatives of employees duly appointed to come and talk over their grievances as man to man with their employers.

Instead of that, if the amendment were adopted, the board would be virtually a police court, and employees would be bringing complaints, such as, that John Jones said to Jim Smith's wife that he was going to lock him out if he did not join this or that union. The board would be nothing but a police court. We have avoided that. The police-court laws still remain. We have not repealed them. The injunctions of the courts still remain. We have not repealed the laws under which they are issued. All we have done is to provide for a better understanding between the employees and the employers, in the expectation and hope that mutual confidence, high regard for each other, and the fact that the employers will confer with the representatives of the majority of their employees will lead in many instances to a peaceful solution of their grievances and a settlement of their disputes. That is the hope of this proposed legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. HASTINGS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Costigan	Johnson	O'Mahoney
Austin	Couzens	Keyes	Overton
Bailey	Davis	La Follette	Schwellenbach
Bankhead	Donahay	Lewis	Sheppard
Barbour	Duffy	Loneragan	Shipstead
Barkley	Fletcher	McCarran	Steiwer
Billbo	Frazier	McGill	Thomas, Okla.
Black	George	McKellar	Thomas, Utah
Bone	Gerry	McNary	Townsend
Borah	Gibson	Maloney	Trammell
Bulow	Glass	Metcalf	Truman
Burke	Gore	Minton	Tydings
Byrd	Guffey	Moore	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Hale	Murphy	Van Nuys
Capper	Harrison	Murray	Wagner
Caraway	Hastings	Neely	Walsh
Clark	Hatch	Norris	White
Connally	Hayden	Nye

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

Mr. TYDINGS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask for a verification of the count. To order a roll call requires only one-fifth of the membership present. I counted, as I believe, 11 Senators in favor of the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been demanded. Is the request seconded? [A pause.] There still is not a sufficient number.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I ask how many the Chair counted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Nine.

Mr. TYDINGS. How many Senators are on the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-one Senators answered to the roll call.

Mr. TYDINGS. I counted more than that. Probably I was mistaken.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All those in favor of the amendment will say "aye." [A pause.] Those opposed will say "no." [A pause.] The "noes" have it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware was trying to get recognition before the result of the vote was announced.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I wish to say that so far as I am concerned I am inclined to try to get through with this bill and not to delay it. I have a speech on my desk which will take 2 or 3 hours, but which I was going to shorten considerably. However, if we are not even going to have the yeas and nays upon an important amendment such as this, there will be no particular hurry about getting the bill through the Senate. I think we are entitled to have the yeas and nays on this question.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, under the rule no Senator is entitled to the yeas and nays unless a sufficient number of Senators second his request.

Mr. HASTINGS. I know that as well as does the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, with no disrespect to the Presiding Officer or the Senate, I do not believe many Senators were apprized of the fact that I was asking for the yeas and nays. I ask unanimous consent that I may again ask for the yeas and nays on the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would like to state for his own protection that the rule of the Senate clearly provides for the manner in which the request for the yeas and nays shall be decided. There were not a sufficient number of hands raised, despite the fact that the Chair clearly stated the request of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senate has not as yet voted on the passage of the measure, and I am entitled again to ask for the yeas and nays. Again I ask for the yeas and nays on the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the yeas and nays be ordered on the pending amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should like to suggest that the Chair had already announced the result of the vote. I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent for a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was rejected, and to ask for a record vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for a reconsideration of the viva voce vote by which the amendment was rejected. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I unite in the request for the yeas and nays. Although I differ with the Senator from Maryland with regard to the amendment, nevertheless I believe in granting him the right to have a record vote on the amendment. I am ready to go on record. I ask that the yeas and nays may be ordered. I should like to see whether or not there are enough Senators here to accord that courtesy to the Senator from Maryland.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the request for the yeas and nays seconded? A sufficient number of Senators having seconded the request, the yeas and nays are ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. LEWIS. I rise to announce the absence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], who are unavoidably detained. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is unavoidably detained on official business. He has been unable to obtain a pair on this vote, but I desire to announce that if present he would vote "nay."

Mr. MURRAY. The senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. DAVIS (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], who, I notice, is absent. Not knowing how he would vote, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. HAYDEN. My colleague the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is unavoidably detained on departmental business. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BARKLEY. The junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] is unavoidably detained on official business. I am not advised how he would vote if present, but I think he would vote "nay."

Mr. DAVIS. May I ask the Senator from Kentucky if that announcement would release my pair? Does his statement about how his colleague would vote release my pair?

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not stating how my colleague would vote if present. I did not state how he would vote. I was just expressing my opinion, and that does not change the status of the pair at all.

Mr. AUSTIN. I wish to announce the general pair of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY].

I also announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] has a pair on this question with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN]. If present, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] would vote "yea", and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN] would vote "nay."

I also announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] are necessarily absent.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the following Senators are necessarily detained from the Senate:

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BACHMAN], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE].

I also desire to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] is absent on a mission of the Senate in the Virgin Islands.

I wish also to announce that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is detained on account of illness.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 50, as follows:

So Mr. TYDINGS' amendment was rejected.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from New York with respect to paragraph (3) on page 4 and see if I clearly understand the paragraph. I desire to read it:

The term "employee" shall include any employee, and shall not be limited to the employees of a particular employer, unless the act explicitly states otherwise, and shall include any individual whose work has ceased as a consequence of, or in connection with, any current labor dispute—

And so forth. Was it the intention to have that definition include a person who is out on strike?

Mr. WAGNER. It may. It is similar to provisions in the Norris Anti-Injunction Act and the Railway Labor Act passed last year.

Mr. HASTINGS. It does, in fact, as I understand, permit the original employee to maintain his position unless he has taken employment with some other person.

Mr. WAGNER. Of course; the decisions of the courts, so far as I know, have generally regarded workers as employees even though they may be on strike.

Mr. HASTINGS. Referring to section 7, which has been read to the Senate several times by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], does the Senator from New York understand that that section would permit employees to do all these things during working hours?

Mr. WAGNER. From what section is the Senator reading?

Mr. HASTINGS. Page 10, section 7. It describes certain rights which the employees shall have, namely:

The right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively—

And so forth. Does that language contemplate that that may be done during working hours, and that the employer can do nothing about it?

Mr. WAGNER. May what be done during working hours?

Mr. HASTINGS. The various things mentioned in section 7. It states that—

Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining—

And so forth.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator asks whether these things may be done during working hours?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. WAGNER. Of course, if employees did that when they should be working, they would be subject to discharge.

Mr. HASTINGS. If they did that during working hours and in consequence were discharged, would not the employer be guilty of an unfair labor practice? I ask that because section 8, paragraph (1), says that—

It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

(1) To interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7.

Mr. WAGNER. No sensible person would interpret that language to mean that while a factory is at work the workers could suddenly stop their duties to have a mass meeting in the plant on the question of organization.

Mr. HASTINGS. The Senator does not think the language is subject to that construction?

Mr. WAGNER. Why, of course not.

Mr. HASTINGS. I desired to be certain that the RECORD would be clear upon that point.

Mr. WAGNER. The RECORD may be clear upon that point.

Mr. HASTINGS. Now let me inquire about paragraph (4), on page 11, which says that it shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

To discharge or otherwise discriminate against an employee because he has filed charges or given testimony under this act.

Suppose an employee should file a perfectly outrageous charge, one which was not true, and which he knew was not true: Under paragraph (4) is it the Senator's notion that the employer might, because of that, and even if that fact were shown, be found guilty of an unfair labor practice?

Mr. WAGNER. Merely because he has filed charges related to unfair labor practices no employee should be discriminated against. That is exactly what that section means; otherwise, even though there might be flagrant violations of the provisions of this measure, an employee would not be free to file charges. He would know that the moment the charges were filed he would be discharged.

Let me give the Senator—

Mr. HASTINGS. The Senator does not need to give any illustration.

Mr. WAGNER. No; but I wish to carry the matter a little further for the Senator's information.

In certain plants which now have company-dominated unions, the employees were asked to sign petitions, to be sent to their representatives, opposing this bill. I received personal letters from workers in which they said they had signed these petitions because they knew if they did not do so their jobs would be lost, and that they needed their jobs in order that their families might eat. It is that sort of discrimination which we wish to prevent.

Mr. HASTINGS. The trouble here is the same trouble we frequently have. In trying to correct one evil, we create a new one. I agree with all that. I agree that the worker ought to have a right to make complaint about the violation of this proposed law, and that he ought not to be discriminated against for so doing; but I had in mind whether we could not put in the measure a provision that a person who did so in good faith should not be discriminated against, and not leave the provision as broad as it is, so that an employee might file charges maliciously, for instance, knowing that he could not lose his job even if he did so maliciously.

Mr. WAGNER. The suggestion of the Senator would bring up another question that would complicate the situation still more. I do not think the provision as it now stands will be subject to any abuse.

Mr. HASTINGS. The Senator from New York is in charge of the bill.

Mr. WAGNER. I am satisfied with the provision as it stands.

Mr. HASTINGS. In view of the vote upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYNDINGS], which it seemed to me ought to have been agreed to, I shall not offer any amendment to this provision. I simply call the Senator's attention to it.

Now may I inquire of the Senator from New York whether, in his judgment, this bill gets around—if I may use that expression—the many decisions of the Supreme Court which seem to me to hold definitely that the Congress cannot do this particular kind of thing?

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator from Delaware inquired as to whether the proposed act was intended to circumvent certain decisions of the courts?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is correct.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not know what particular cases the Senator has in mind, but I am sure he is acquainted with the case of Texas against Railway Clerks, in which the United States Supreme Court upheld an injunction that had been issued against a railroad company for interfering with the representatives of the railway clerks' union, who had been elected, as the evidence before the Court showed, by a majority of the railway clerks. The railway company, in order to have a bargaining agency more convenient to itself, organized a company union. The injunction dissolved the company-dominated unions, upheld workers' right to organize, and recognized the majority rule. In short, this court decision upholds the philosophy of the pending legislation.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I reached the conclusion more than 2 or 3 years ago that this place is not the proper place to argue any constitutional question.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator does not reach that conclusion because he has not heard constitutional questions discussed, does he?

Mr. HASTINGS. No. It is more or less of a joke around the Senate that anybody who talks about the Constitution or raises a constitutional question considers himself a constitutional lawyer. From my point of view, one does not have to be anything more than a law student to reach the conclusion that the proposed act is unconstitutional.

I went to the trouble to gather some extracts from the opinions of the Supreme Court and of other courts which I think are applicable to this particular subject. It would take me quite a little while to read them, and I doubt whether a reading of them would interest very many Members of the Senate. It occurred to me, however, that these quotations might be of some service at some other time if they were printed in the RECORD, and while it may be a little unusual, I was wondering whether I might get unanimous consent to have these extracts from these decisions placed in the RECORD at the end of my remarks. It would save a great deal of time.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not wish to object to what the Senator is requesting, but I wish he would state the points to which the decisions run as to the unconstitutionality of the proposed legislation.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think I can state it briefly. Of course, the principle involved is the right of the individual to make his own bargain with his employer. That is the principal thing.

The Senator from Idaho will remember the case of Adair, as I recall the name, against a hospital in Washington, which involved the hours of labor for women, giving the authority to a board. One of the reasons why I should like to have these decisions in this particular place is that I think they go to other things which are to come before the Congress within the next 2 or 3 weeks, such as the social security bill. The theory is that it denies the freedom of contract between an individual and his employer. I am quite certain, from my study of the pending bill, that it does that as completely as any bill that has ever been proposed in the Congress.

Mr. WAGNER. Will the Senator yield to me long enough to read a short extract? It will take but a moment.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the Senator will permit me to have these decisions incorporated, I shall close my remarks and yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Delaware?

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In Adair v. United States (208 U. S. 161, 52 Law Ed. 436) the Court held unconstitutional a provision of a Federal statute making it a criminal offense against the United States for an agent or officer of an interstate carrier, having full authority in the premises from his principal, to discharge an employee from the service of such carrier because of his membership in a labor organization.

Mr. Justice Harlan, speaking for the Court, said (p. 174):

"While, as already suggested, the right of liberty and property guaranteed by the Constitution against deprivation without due process of law is subject to such reasonable restraints as the common good or the general welfare may require, it is not within the functions of government—at least, in the absence of contract between the parties—to compel any person, in the course of his business and against his will, to accept or retain the personal services of another, or to compel any person, against his will, to perform personal services for another. The right of a person to sell his labor upon such terms as he deems proper is, in its essence, the same as the right of the purchaser of labor to prescribe the conditions upon which he will accept such labor from the person offering to sell it. . . . In all such particulars the employer and the employee have equality of right, and any legislation that disturbs that equality is an arbitrary interference with the liberty of contract which no government can legally justify in a free land. . . . [Italics ours.]

"As the relations and the conduct of the parties toward each other was not controlled by any contract other than a general employment on one side to accept the services of the employee and a general agreement on the other side to render services to the employer—no term being fixed for the continuance of the employment—Congress could not, consistently with the fifth amendment, make it a crime against the United States to discharge the employee because of his being a member of a labor organization. [Italics ours.]

"Looking alone at the words of the statute for the purpose of ascertaining its scope and effect, and of determining its validity, we hold that there is no such connection between interstate commerce and membership in a labor organization as to authorize Congress to make it a crime against the United States for an agent of an interstate carrier to discharge an employee because of such membership on his part. If such a power exists in Congress, it is difficult to perceive why it might not, by absolute regulation, require interstate carriers, under penalties, to employ, in the conduct of its interstate business, only members of labor organizations, or only those who are not members of such organizations—a power which could not be recognized as existing under the Constitution of the United States. . . ."

Again, in Coppage v. Kansas (236 U. S. 1, 59 Law Ed. 441), which involved the constitutionality of a statute of Kansas declaring it a misdemeanor for an employer or any of his employees to coerce, require, demand, or influence any person or persons to enter into any agreement, either written or verbal, not to join or become or remain a member of any labor organization or association, as a condition of such person or persons securing employment, or continuing in the employment of such individual, firm, or corporation, the Court, after elaborate discussion and review of the decided cases, held that the State statute was repugnant to the fourteenth amendment of the Federal Constitution.

Mr. Justice Pitney, speaking for the Court, said (p. 14):

" . . . Included in the right of personal liberty and the right of private property—partaking of the nature of each—is the right to make contracts for the acquisition of property. Chief among such contracts is that of personal employment, by which labor and other services are exchanged for money or other forms of property. If this right be struck down or arbitrarily interfered with, there is a substantial impairment of liberty in the long-established constitutional sense. The right is as essential to the laborer as to the capitalist, to the poor as to the rich; for the vast majority of persons have no other honest way to begin to acquire property save by working for money. [Italics ours.]

I do not contend that employers and employees do not have the right to enter into voluntary agreements with each other that the employees shall or shall not become members of a labor organization. But, as held by the Court in Adair v. United States, supra, the purchase of labor by the employer and the sale of labor by the employee are property rights guaranteed by the Constitution. Congress does not have the constitutional power to prohibit by legislation an employer from discharging an employee from service because of his membership in a labor organization, such holding being based upon the ground that there is no such connection between interstate commerce and membership in a labor organization as to authorize Congress to make it a crime against the United States for officers or employees of an interstate carrier to discharge an employee from service because of such membership on his part.

To the same effect is Adkins et al. v. Children's Hospital of the District of Columbia (261 U. S. 525, 67 Law Ed. 785). That case involved the constitutionality of an act of Congress providing for the fixing of minimum wages for women and children in the District of Columbia. Any violation of the act by an employer or his agent constituted a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment. One of the declared purposes of the act was "to protect the women and minors of the District from conditions detrimental to their health and morals, resulting from wages which are inadequate to maintain decent standards of living; and the act, in each of its provisions and in its entirety, shall be interpreted to effectuate these purposes." The act was held unconstitutional.

Mr. Justice Sutherland, speaking for the Court, said (p. 545):

"The statute now under consideration is attacked upon the ground that it authorizes an unconstitutional interference with the freedom of contract included within the guaranties of the due process clause of the fifth amendment. That the right to contract about one's affairs is a part of the liberty of the individual protected by this clause is settled by the decisions of this court, and is no longer open to question (Allgeyer v. Louisiana (165 U. S. 578, 591, 41 L. ed. 832, 836, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 427); New York L. Ins. Co. v. Dodge (246 U. S. 357, 373, 374, 62 L. ed. 772, 781, 782, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 337, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 593); Coppage v. Kansas (236 U. S. 1, 10, 14, 59 L. ed. 441, 444, 446, L. R. A. 1915C, 960, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 40); Adair v. United States (208 U. S. 161, 52 L. ed. 436, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 277, 13 Ann. Cas. 764); Lochner v. New York (198 U. S. 45, 49 L. ed. 937, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 539, 3 Ann. Cas. 1133); Butchers' Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. v. Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. (111 U. S. 746, 28 L. ed. 585, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 652); Muller v. Oregon (208 U. S. 412, 421, 52 L. ed. 551, 555, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 324, 13 Ann. Cas. 957)). Within this liberty are contracts of employment of labor. In making such contracts, generally speaking, the parties have an equal right to obtain from each other the best terms they can as the result of private bargaining."

Again in Lochner v. New York (198 U. S. 45, 49 Law Ed. 937), a New York State statute was held unconstitutional which restricted the employment of all persons in bakeries to 60 hours per week and 10 hours in any one day. Mr. Justice Peckham, speaking for the Court, said (p. 56):

"It must, of course, be conceded that there is a limit to the valid exercise of the police power by the State. There is no dispute concerning this general proposition. Otherwise the fourteenth amendment would have no efficacy and the legislatures of the States would have unbounded power; and it would be enough to say that any piece of legislation was enacted to conserve the morals, the health, or the safety of the people; such legislation would be valid, no matter how absolutely without foundation the claim might be. The claim of the police power would be a mere pretext—become another and delusive name for the supreme sovereignty of the State, to be exercised free from constitutional restraint."

And again (pp. 57, 58):

"It is a question of which of two powers or rights shall prevail—the power of the State to legislate or the right of the individual to liberty of person and freedom of contract. The mere assertion that the subject relates, though but in a remote degree, to the public health, does not necessarily render the enactment valid. The act must have a more direct relation, as a means to an end, and the end itself must be appropriate and legitimate, before an act can be held to be valid which interferes with the general right of an individual to be free in his person and in his power to contract in relation to his own labor."

Coming, then, directly to the statute (p. 58), the Court said:

"We think the limit of the police power has been reached and passed in this case. There is, in our judgment, no reasonable foundation for holding this to be necessary or appropriate as a health law to safeguard the public health or the health of the individuals who are following the trade of a baker. If this statute be valid, and if, therefore, a proper case is made out in which to deny the right of an individual, sui juris, as employer or employee, to make contracts for the labor of the latter under the protection of the provisions of the Federal Constitution, there would seem to be no length to which legislation of this nature might not go."

And, after pointing out the unreasonable range to which the principle of the statute might be extended, the Court said (p. 60):

"It is also urged, pursuing the same line of argument, that it is to the interest of the State that its population should be strong and robust, and therefore any legislation which may be said to tend to make people healthy must be valid as health laws, enacted under the police power. If this be a valid argument and a justification for this kind of legislation, it follows that the protection of the Federal Constitution from undue interference with liberty of person and freedom of contract is visionary wherever the law is sought to be justified as a valid exercise of the police power. Scarcely any law but might find shelter under such assumptions, and 'conduct', properly so-called, as well as contract, would come under the restrictive sway of the legislature."

And further (p. 61):

"Statutes of the nature of that under review, limiting the hours in which grown and intelligent men may labor to earn their living, are mere meddlesome interferences with the rights of the individual * * * whose rights are interfered with, unless there be some fair ground, reasonable in and of itself, to say that there is material danger to the public health or to the health of the employees if the hours of labor are not curtailed."

Charles Wolff Packing Company v. Court of Industrial Relations of the State of Kansas (262 U. S. 522, 67 Law Ed. 1103) involved the validity of the Court of Industrial Relations Act of Kansas. The act declared the following to be affected with a public interest: First, manufacture and preparation of food for human consumption; second, manufacture of clothing for human wear; third, production of any substance in common use for fuel; fourth, transportation of the foregoing; fifth, public utilities and common carriers. The act vested an industrial court of three judges with power, upon its own initiative or on complaint, to summon the parties and hear any dispute over wages or other terms of employment in any such industry, and if it should find the peace and health of the public imperiled by such controversy it was required to make findings and fix the wages and other terms for the future conduct of the industry. The Supreme Court held that the act, insofar as it permitted the fixing of wages in the Wolff packing house, was in conflict with the fourteenth amendment and deprived it of its property and liberty of contract without due process of law.

Mr. Chief Justice Taft, speaking for the Court, said (p. 533):

"The necessary postulate of the Industrial Court Act is that the State, representing the people, is so much interested in their peace, health, and comfort that it may compel those engaged in the manufacture of food and clothing, and the production of fuel, whether owners or workers, to continue in their business and employment on terms fixed by an agency of the State, if they cannot agree. Under the construction adopted by the State supreme court, the act gives the industrial court authority to permit the owner or employer to go out of the business, if he shows that he can only continue on the terms fixed at such heavy loss that collapse will follow; but this privilege, under the circumstances, is generally illusory (Block v. Hirsh (256 U. S. 135, 157; 65 L. Ed. 865, 871; 16 A. L. R. 165; 41 Sup. Ct. Rep. 458)). A laborer dissatisfied with his wages is permitted to quit, but he may not agree with his fellows to quit or combine with others to induce them to quit.

"These qualifications do not change the essence of the act. It curtails the right of the employer, on the one hand, and of the employee, on the other, to contract about his affairs. This is part of the liberty of the individual protected by the guaranty of the due-process clause of the fourteenth amendment (Meyer v. Nebraska, decided June 4, 1923 (262 U. S. 390, ante, 1042; — A. L. R. —; 43 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625)). While there is no such thing as absolute freedom of contract, and it is subject to a variety of restraints, they must not be arbitrary or unreasonable. Freedom is the general rule, and restraint the exception. The legislative authority to abridge can be justified only by exceptional circumstances (Adkins v. Children's Hospital, decided April 9, 1923 (261 U. S. 525; ante, 785; 24 A. L. R. 1238; 43 Sup. Ct. Rep. 394))."

After the above decision and after receipt of the mandate of the Supreme Court the State court rendered certain judgments, whereupon the company again took the case to the Supreme Court (297 U. S. 552, 69 Law Ed. 785). The Court, speaking through Mr. Justice Van Devanter, on the second appeal, said (p. 569):

"The system of compulsory arbitration which the act establishes is intended to compel, and if sustained will compel, the owner and employees to continue the business on terms which are not of their making. It will constrain them not merely to respect the terms if they continue the business, but will constrain them to continue the business on those terms. True, the terms have some qualifications, but, as shown in the prior decision, the qualifications are rather illusory and do not subtract much from the duty imposed. Such a system infringes the liberty of contract and rights of property guaranteed by the due process of law clause of the fourteenth amendment. 'The established doctrine is that this liberty may not be interfered with, under the guise of protecting the public interest, by legislative action which is arbitrary or without reasonable relation to some purpose within the competency of the State to effect' (Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U. S. 390, 399; 67 L. ed. 1042, 1045; 29 A. L. R. 1446; 43 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625)."

Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. v. Mitchell et al. (245 U. S. 229, 62 L. ed. 260) involved the matter of an injunction against interference by members of a labor organization with the plaintiff's relations with its employees. Mr. Justice Pitney, speaking for the Court, said (pp. 250-251):

"* * * Whatever may be the advantages of 'collective bargaining', it is not bargaining at all, in any just sense, unless it is voluntary on both sides. The same liberty which enables men to form unions, and through the union to enter into agreements with employers willing to agree, entitles other men to employ no man who owes any allegiance or obligation to the union. In the latter case, as in the former, the parties are entitled to be protected by the law in the enjoyment of the benefits of any lawful agreement they may make. This Court repeatedly has held that the employer is as free to make nonmembership in a union a condition of employment as the workman is free to join the union, and that this is a part of the constitutional rights of personal liberty and private property, not to be taken away even by legislation, unless through some proper exercise of the paramount police power (Adair v. United States, 208 U. S. 161, 174, 52 L. ed. 436, 442, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 277, 13 Ann. Cas. 764; Coppage v. Kansas, 236

U. S. 1, 14, 59 L. ed. 441, 446; L. R. A. 1915C, 960, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 240) * * *"

Goldfield Consolidated Mines Co. v. Goldfield Miners' Union, No. 220, et al. (159 Fed. 500), involved the validity of a Nevada Statute which provided:

"SECTION 1. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to make or enter into any agreement, either oral or in writing, by the terms of which any employee of such person, firm, or corporation, or any person about to enter the employ of such person, firm, or corporation, as a condition for continuing or obtaining such employment, shall promise or agree not to become or continue a member of a labor organization, or shall promise or agree to become or continue a member of a labor organization.

"SEC. 2. Any person or persons, firm or firms, corporation or corporations, violating the provisions of section 1 of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor," etc.

The Court said (p. 514):

"It is a constitutional right of an employer to refuse to have business relations with any person or with any labor organization, and it is immaterial what his reasons are, whether good or bad, well or ill founded, or entirely trivial and whimsical. Under the conditions existing in Goldfield at the time the resolutions were published, it is possible that the only practical method of exercising this right was to require all employees to refrain from being or becoming members of the Western Federation of Miners. Thus we have a right guaranteed by the Constitution, and its exercise blocked, or at least hindered and restricted, by the statute of Nevada. It is too clear to require a citation of authorities that the legislature has no power to restrict the exercise of a constitutional right, unless the interests of the public, as distinguished from the interests of the individual, or of a class of individuals, demand such restraint. The act so forbidden by the legislature must be detrimental to the public welfare, and the health, safety, or morals of the community to justify such interference. There can be no pretense here, and none is made, that the execution of such a contract as the one in question has any tendency to injure the health, safety, or morals of the public, or of either employer or employees. It is clear that the Nevada statute deprives the employer of the right to contract as to certain matters which may be vital to him, and that it also, while not preventing, does obstruct the exercise of his right to exclude objectionable persons from his employ. The fact that the statute includes an element which is not found in any other similar statute to which attention has been called, in that it prohibits contracts requiring employees to join a union as a condition of employment, in no wise heals its invalidity; the added element simply makes larger and wider the invasion of the liberty of the employer to fix the terms and conditions upon which he will contract for labor.

"The terms 'life, liberty, and property' as used in the Federal Constitution, embrace every right which the law protects. They include not only the right to hold and enjoy but also the means of holding, enjoying, acquiring, and disposing of property. The right to labor is property. It is one of the most valuable and fundamental of rights. The right to work is the right to earn one's subsistence, to live, and to support wife and family. The right of master and servant to enter into contracts, to agree upon the terms and conditions under which the one will employ and the other will labor, is property. The master has the right to fix the terms and conditions upon which he is willing to give employment; the servant has the right to fix the terms and conditions upon which he will labor, and any statute which curtails and limits that right deprives the party affected of his property; and, in the same measure, of his liberty. Both parties are free to enter into, or refuse to enter into, the contract. Before the law there is the same freedom to employ as to work, to buy as to sell, to choose one's employee as to choose one's employer."

Montgomery et al. v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co. (C. C. A. 9th Circuit) (293 Fed. 680) was a suit in equity by the railway company against Montgomery and others to make permanent a preliminary injunction restraining the defendants from interfering with the contractual relations existing between the railway company and its employees.

The contention was made that the contract in question was in violation of the Penal Code of California.

The provision of the penal code, which was quoted in the opinion, was held unconstitutional.

The Court said (p. 684):

"It is contended, however, that, conceding that there were contractual relations between the plaintiff and its employees, as stated in the complaint, the contract was in violation of law under section 679 of the Penal Code of California, which provides:

"Any person or corporation within this State, or agent or officer on behalf of such person or corporation, who shall hereafter coerce or compel any person or persons to enter into an agreement, either written or verbal, not to join or become a member of any labor organization, as a condition of such person or persons securing employment or continuing in the employment of any such person or corporation, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

"In Coppage v. State of Kansas (236 U. S. 1, 26, 35 Sup. Ct. 240, 59 L. ed. 441, L. R. A. 1915C, 960), the Supreme Court of the United States held a similar statute in Kansas 'repugnant to the "due process" clause of the fourteenth amendment, and therefore void.' We are of the opinion that this decision is controlling in this case, and that the statute of the State is void."

Gillespie v. People (Supreme Court of Illinois) (58 N. E. 1007) involved the constitutionality of an Illinois statute which provided:

"That it shall be unlawful for any individual or member of any firm, or agent, officer, or employee of any company or corporation to prevent, or attempt to prevent, employees from forming, joining, and belonging to any lawful labor organization, and any such individual, member, agent, officer, or employee that coerces or attempts to coerce employees by discharging or threatening to discharge from their employ or the employ of any firm, company, or corporation because of their connection with such lawful labor organization, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $100 or be imprisoned for not more than 6 months, or both, in the discretion of the court."

The statute was held unconstitutional. The Court said (p. 1009):

"* * * The terms 'life', 'liberty', and 'property' are representative terms and intended to cover every right to which a member of the body politic is entitled under the law. These terms include the right of self-defense, freedom of speech, religious and political freedom, exemption from arbitrary arrests, the right freely to buy and sell as others may. Indeed, they may embrace all our liberties, personal, civil, and political, including the rights to labor, to contract, to terminate contracts, and to acquire property. None of these liberties and rights can be taken away, except by due process of law (2 Story, Const. (5th ed.), sec. 1950). The rights of life, liberty, and property embrace whatever is necessary to secure and effectuate the enjoyment of those rights. The rights of liberty and of property include the right to acquire property by labor and by contract (Ritchie v. People, 155 Ill. 98, 40 N. E. 454, 29 L. R. A. 79). If an owner cannot be deprived of his property without due process of law, he cannot be deprived of any of the essential attributes which belong to the right of property without due process of law. Labor is property. The laborer has the same right to sell his labor, and to contract with reference thereto, as any other property owner. The right of property involves, as one of its essential attributes, the right not only to contract but also to terminate contracts. * * *

People v. Marcus (Court of Appeals, New York) (77 N. E. 1073) involved the constitutionality of a New York statute, which provided:

"Any person or persons, employer or employers of labor, and any person or persons of any corporation or corporations on behalf of such corporation or corporations, who shall hereafter coerce or compel any person or persons, employee or employees, laborer or mechanic, to enter into an agreement, either written or verbal from such person, persons, employee, laborer, or mechanic, not to join or become a member of any labor organization, as a condition of such person or persons securing employment, or continuing in the employment of any such person or persons, employer or employers, corporation or corporations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor."

The statute was held unconstitutional. The Court said (p. 1074):

"* * * Contracts for labor may be freely made with individuals or a combination of individuals, and so long as they do not interfere with public safety, health, or morals they are not illegal. The views of this Court as to what constitutes freedom to contract in relation to the purchase and sale of labor and as to what contracts relating thereto are lawful and enforceable were stated with much detail and ability by the members of the Court when the cases of National Protective Association v. Cumming (170 N. Y. 315, 63 N. E. 369, 58 L. R. A. 135, 88 Am. S. Rep. 648) and Jacobs v. Cohen (183 N. Y. 207, 76 N. E. 5) were decided, and the decisions in those cases are substantially controlling in the determination of this appeal."

"In National Protective Association v. Cummings, supra, it was said that a person may refuse to work for another on any ground that he may regard as sufficient and the employer has no right to demand a reason for it, but even if the reason is that the employee refuses to work with another who is not a member of his organization, it does not affect his right to stop work or to refuse to enter upon an employment. The converse of this statement must be true, and an employer of labor may refuse to employ a person who is a member of any labor organization or he may make an employment conditional upon the person employed refraining from joining or becoming a member of a labor organization. It is a well-known fact that combinations of employees and also of employers require their members to do or refrain from doing many things which they deem to their individual and combined advantage while a person not a member of such an organization can act in accordance with the terms of such agreement as he may choose to make. A person employing labor may decide that it is to his advantage to employ only union labor, and be willing to enter into an agreement necessary to procure such labor or he may decide that it is to his advantage to employ non-union labor, in which case he may also decide that it is to his advantage to make the employment conditional upon an agreement that such employee will not join or become a member of a labor organization."

In Jacobs v. Cohen, supra, an employees' union sued certain manufacturing employers on a promissory note given by them as collateral security to be applied as liquidated damages for the violation of a certain agreement by which the manufacturing employers agreed not to employ any help whatsoever other than members of said labor union who should procure a pass card showing that they were in good standing in said union, and by which they further agreed to conform to the rules and regulations of said union and cease to employ anyone not in good standing in said union, and by which they further agreed to many restrictive and other provisions relating to the conduct of their business, which are stated more fully in the prevailing and dissenting opinions in this court. The answer in the second separate defense alleged in substance that the contract was in restraint of trade, and that its purpose is to combine employers and employees whereby the freedom of the citizen in pursuing his lawful trade and calling is, through said contract, combination, and arrangement, hampered and restricted, and that it also for the purpose of coercing workmen to become members of a particular employees' organization under penalty of loss of position and deprivation of employment, and that it is against public policy and unlawful. Two questions were submitted to this court, viz: (1) Is a contract made by an employer of labor, by which he binds himself to employ and to retain in his employ only members in good standing of a single labor union, consonant with public policy and enforceable in the courts of justice in this State? (2) Is the "second" separate defense, contained in the answer herein of the defendants Morris Cohen and Louis Cohen, insufficient upon the face thereof to constitute a defense? Both of these questions were answered in the affirmative, and the court said: "Whatever else may be said of it, this is the case of an agreement voluntarily made by an employer with his workmen, which bound the latter to give their skilled services for a certain period of time, upon certain conditions, regulating the performance of the work to be done and restricting the class of workmen, who should be engaged upon it, to such persons as were in affiliation with an association organized by the employer's workmen with reference to the carrying on of the very work. It would seem as though an employer should be unquestionably free to enter into such a contract with his workmen for the conduct of the business without its being deemed obnoxious upon any ground of public policy. If it might operate to prevent some persons from being employed by the firm, or possibly, from remaining in the firm's employment, that is but an incidental feature. Its restrictions were not of an oppressive nature, operating generally in the community to prevent such craftsmen from obtaining employment and from earning their livelihood. It was but a private agreement between an employer and his employees concerning the conduct of the business for a year, and securing to the latter an absolute right to limit the class of their fellow workmen to those persons who should be in affiliation with an organization entered into with design of protecting their interests in carrying on the work."

"That freedom to contract which entitles an employer to make by agreement his place of business wholly within the control of a labor union entitles him, if he so desires, to require of his employees that they be wholly independent of any labor union."

Re Opinion of the Justices, Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court (171 N. E. 234), involved the constitutionality of a bill introduced in the State legislature, as to the constitutionality of which the State supreme court was requested to render an opinion, which bill declared that provisions in contracts of employment whereby either party undertook not to join, become, or remain a member of a labor union or of any organization of employers, or undertook in such event to withdraw from the contract of employment, to be against public policy and void. The State supreme court held the bill would be unconstitutional if enacted into law.

The court based its decision principally on the decisions of the Supreme Court in Adair v. United States, supra; Coppage v. Kansas, supra; and Adkins v. Children's Hospital, supra.

The Court said (p. 235):

"The principles thus declared by the Supreme Court of the United States prevail in this Commonwealth. The provisions of articles 1, 10, and 12 of the declaration of rights of the constitution of this Commonwealth are as strong in protection of individual rights and freedom as those of the fifth and fourteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States. It was said in Commonwealth v. Perty (155 Mass. 117, 121, 28 N. E. 1126, 1127, 14 L. R. A. 325, 31 Am. St. Rep. 533): 'The right to acquire, possess, and protect property includes the right to make reasonable contracts, which shall be under the protection of the law.' To the same general effect are Opinion of the Justices (208 Mass. 619, 94 N. E. 1044, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 771); Rice, Barton & Fales Machine & Iron Foundry Co. v. Willard (242 Mass. 566, 572, 136 N. E. 629); Moore Drop Forging Co. v. McCarthy (243 Mass. 554, 137 N. E. 919); and A. T. Stearns Lumber Co. v. Howlett (260 Mass. 45, 60, 61, 157 N. E. 82, 52 A. L. R. 1125). The Adair and Coppage cases have been recognized and followed in Opinion of the Justices (220 Mass. 627, 630, 108 N. E. 807, L. R. A. 1917B, 1119); Bogni v. Perotti (224 Mass. 152, 155, 112 N. E. 853, L. R. A. 1916F, 831); and Opinion of the Justices (Mass.) (166 N. E. 401, 63 A. L. R. 838). The views expressed in these several opinions and decisions, which need not be further amplified, are decisive of the question here propounded. There is a wide field for the valid regulation of freedom of contract in the exercise of the police power in the interests of the public health, the public safety, or the public morals, and, in a certain restricted sense, of the public welfare. * * *

State, etc., v. Daniels (Supreme Court of Minnesota) (136 N. E. 584) involved the constitutionality of a Minnesota statute which made it an offense for an employer to require or influence any person to agree not to join or remain in a labor union as a condition of obtaining or retaining employment.

The court held the State statute unconstitutional under the decision of the Supreme Court in Adair v. United States, supra.

The court said (p. 586):

"* * * It therefore necessarily follows that, when the Supreme Court of the United States held the provision of the act of Congress in the particular upon which the first count of the indictment in the Adair case is based to be void as an encroachment upon the personal rights guaranteed by the language quoted from the fifth amendment, a similar provision in an act of the legislature of a State must likewise be held to be an invasion of the same rights and prohibited in the very same terms by section 1 of the fourteenth amendment, limiting the powers of the States.

"Insofar as the Federal Supreme Court has declared an enactment of a legislative body to be in contravention of the Constitution of the United States, this Court is in duty bound to follow and declare an act of like character, scope, and effect invalid. Section 5097 (R. L. 1905) in this particular, under which the prosecution against relator is attempted, is so essentially like that part of the act of Congress under which the indictment of Adair was drawn in its scope, purpose, and result that it may not be distinguished therefrom * * *."

Bemis v. State (C. C. A. Oklahoma) (152 Pac. 456) involved the constitutionality of an Oklahoma statute which provided:

"Any person or corporation within the State, or agent, or officer on behalf of such person or corporation, who shall hereafter cause or compel any person to enter into an agreement either written or verbal, not to join or be a member of any labor organization as a condition of such person securing employment or continuing in the employment of any such person or corporation, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be fined a sum not less than $200, nor more than $1,000, or imprisonment in the county jail not less than 90 days nor more than 12 months, or both such fine and imprisonment."

The court held the statute unconstitutional, citing in support of its decision Adair v. United States, supra, and Coppage v. Kansas, supra.

State, etc., v. Kreutzberg (Supreme Court, Wisconsin) (90 N. W. 1098) involved the constitutionality of a Wisconsin statute providing that no person or corporation shall discharge an employee because he is a member of any labor organization. The statute was held invalid as imposing a restraint on individual freedom guaranteed by the State and Federal Constitutions. The court said (p. 1102):

"Free will in making private contracts, and even in greater degree in refusing to make them, is one of the most important and sacred of the individual rights intended to be protected. That the present act curtails it directly, seriously, and prejudicially cannot be doubted. The success in life of the employer depends on the efficiency, fidelity, and loyalty of his employees. Without enlarging upon or debating the relative advantages or disadvantages of the labor union, either to its members or to the community at large, it is axiomatic that an employer cannot have undivided fidelity, loyalty, and devotion to his interests from an employee who has given to an association right to control his conduct. He may by its decision be required to limit the amount of his daily product. He may be restrained from teaching his art to others. He may be forbidden to work in association with other men whose service the employer desires. He may not be at liberty to work with such machines or upon such materials or products as the employer deems essential to his success. In all these respects he may be disabled from the full degree of usefulness attributable to the same abilities in another who had not yielded up to an association any right to restrain his freedom of will and exertion in his employer's behalf according to the latter's wishes. Such considerations an employer has a right to deem valid reasons for preferring not to jeopardize his success by employing members of organizations. A man who has by agreement or otherwise shackled any of his faculties—even his freedom of will—may well be considered less useful or less desirable by some employers than if free and untrammelled. Whether the workman can find in his membership in such organizations advantages and compensations to offset his lessened desirability in the industrial market is a question each must decide for himself. His right to freedom in so doing is of the same grade and sacredness as that of the employer to consent or refuse to employ him according to the decision he makes. We must not forget that our Government is founded on the idea of equality of all individuals before the law. Such restraints as may be placed on one may be placed on another. If the liberty of the employer to contract or refuse to contract may be denied, so may that of the employee * * *."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, section 7 of the bill reads as follows:

Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities, for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] offered an amendment to add the words "without intimidation or coercion from any source." It seemed to me that that was a perfectly proper and appropriate amendment. I voted for the amendment believing that it would be to the best interest of the employees.

I am not sure that there is to be a yea-and-nay vote on the bill, and I want to say that I am thoroughly in favor of it, and expect to vote for it, believing it will do great good in aiding in the settling of disputes between employers and employees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further amendments to be offered? If not, the question is, Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and to be read the third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in connection with the bill before the Senate, I ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point, as a part of my remarks, a statement by Rt. Rev. Monsignor John A. Ryan, director of the social action department of the National Catholic Welfare Conference; a statement by the Reverend James Myers, industrial secretary of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America; and a statement by Rabbi Sidney E. Goldstein, chairman of the social justice commission of the Central Conferences of American Rabbis.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statements referred to are as follows:

STATEMENT BY RT. REV. MSGR. JOHN A. RYAN, DIRECTOR, SOCIAL ACTION DEPARTMENT, NATIONAL CATHOLIC WELFARE CONFERENCE

With practical unanimity, the economic historians and the economists have for many years held that labor organization is necessary for the protection of the workers. The argument is very simple: The individual wage earner does not possess equal bargaining power with the individual employer; in order to obtain a reasonable measure of such equality, he must combine with his fellows and act as one moral person in the bargaining process.

To bring about this condition is the main object of the Wagner bill. Hence, sections 7 to 9 seem to be the most important of the entire bill. Section 7 describes the right of organization in general terms. Sections 8 and 9 would make this right effective. No reasonable objection can be raised to the provisions of section 8 which forbid the employer to interfere with free organization by his employees, to dominate, interfere with, or contribute financially to any labor organization. Unless these provisions are enforced by law, the bargaining power of the employees is seriously and fatally diminished.

The provision for majority rule is likewise essential to effective bargaining and equality of bargaining power. While the device of proportional representation of different groups of workers in an establishment for purposes of collective bargaining has a certain appearance of fairness, it is entirely impracticable at the present time in the United States. The representatives of the regular labor unions will not sit down on the same side of the bargaining table with the representatives of a company union or with the representatives of a Communist union. This may be deplorable, but it is a fact that cannot be changed by any amount of preaching or legislation in the near future. Therefore, the only practical solution is to let the representatives who have been elected by the majority of the employees in any plant or industry carry on the bargaining process for the whole group. After all, this exemplifies the principle of majority rule which obtains throughout all the political processes of election and legislation.

STATEMENT BY THE REVEREND JAMES MYERS, INDUSTRIAL SECRETARY, FEDERAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN AMERICA

While the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America has taken no action on the bill as such, I desire to call your attention to recent important declarations of the council on labor relations which bear upon the basic principles involved.

In January 1935, the executive committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America has from its beginning contended for the right of labor as well as of employers to organize and deal collectively through representatives of their own choosing as the most hopeful method of assuring orderly, just, and cooperative industrial relations; be it

"Resolved, That the executive committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, while recognizing that all parties involved—labor, employers, and the general public—have rights and liberties which must be conserved, favors the strengthening of the authority and effectiveness of impartial national and regional labor boards."

In June 1934, the executive committee passed the following declarations: "Serious conflict has arisen over the refusal of strong employing groups to recognize trade unions and their determination to limit negotiations with labor to dealings with their own employees. The reasons for labor's insistence upon a broad basis of organization and upon representation of the workers by persons chosen and paid by themselves are too plain for argument. They are precisely the same reasons that impel employers to organize and to secure the ablest representatives of their own interests, chosen and paid by themselves."

The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, which is a federation of 23 national Protestant denominations, has for the 26 years of its existence stood for the right of labor as well as employers to organize. The official document, known as the "Social Ideals of the Churches", enumerates many social ideals for which the churches should stand, including article no. 8, which reads: "The right of employees and employers alike to organize for collective bargaining and social action; protection of both in the exercise of this right; the obligation of both to work for the public good."

The executive committee of the Federal Council has also declared it to be a moral obligation of organized labor to admit to its membership "competent workers without distinction of nationality or race." I would recommend that the bill be amended so as to safeguard this principle.

The majority-rule provisions of the bill are, in my judgment, in line with our democratic traditions, and comparable for the workers to the provision in codes for employers which constitutes an employers' association with a substantial majority of employers of an industry as the spokesman for the entire industry.

In my opinion, the passage of the national labor relations bill is essential to peaceful progress in labor relations in this country. From my wide observation of labor conditions in various parts of the country it is my solemn judgment that there is real danger of prolonged bitter labor controversy which will greatly disturb the general welfare of the Nation unless this legislation is adopted to safeguard the inherent rights of the parties to industry. This, as I see it, is the duty of the Government.

STATEMENT BY RABBI SIDNEY E. GOLDSTEIN, CHAIRMAN SOCIAL JUSTICE COMMISSION, CENTRAL CONFERENCE OF AMERICAN RABBIS

We heartily endorse and support the Wagner bill for two reasons: In the first place, it establishes as the law of the land the right of the workers to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing; in the second place, it outlaws unfair practices on the part of employers in their relation to the working classes.

The history of labor in America and in other countries proves that the workers can advance their own welfare only to the degree that they acquire power to bargain collectively through organization of forces. Wages are increased, hours are shortened, and working conditions improved not by the employer but through the demand labor is able to make by virtue of its strength.

In this economic crisis it is more necessary than ever to protect and preserve the rights of labor to organize and to direct its own destiny. It is only through a decrease in hours and an increase in income that the workers can assure themselves even a reasonable amount of employment and a decent standard of living. With 12,000,000 men and women still out of work, full-time labor must insist upon a reduction in the weekly hours of work. With the annual income of the great mass of the working classes far below a normal level it is impossible to escape from this morass of misery. There can be no recovery from the economic collapse until the working classes recover their purchasing power. The chief hope lies not in the employers' groups and their codes but in the National Labor Board that this bill is designed to establish that in turn will protect the workers and promote their welfare.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the final passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. DAVIS. I have a general pair on this question with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], who is unavoidably detained. I understand that if he were present he would vote as I am about to vote. Therefore I feel free to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BULKLEY. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], who is necessarily absent from the Senate. If present, he would vote as I intend to vote. I therefore feel free to vote and shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HAYDEN. My colleague the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is necessarily detained from the Senate on official business. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. MCKELLAR. My colleague [Mr. BACHMAN] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. He has a pair with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON]. If my colleague were present he would vote "yea", and I am informed that if the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. BYRD. My colleague, the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is unavoidably absent. He has a special pair on this question with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN]. If present, the Senator from New Hampshire would vote "yea", and my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

I regret to announce that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] is necessarily detained from the Senate on official business in the Virgin Islands.

Mr. AUSTIN. I wish to announce a general pair between the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. I am not informed how either Senator would vote on this question if they were present and voting.

I also announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] is necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 63, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—63

Adams	Costigan	Long	Radeliffe
Bankhead	Couzens	McAdoo	Robinson

So the bill was passed.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, on May 8 I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill H. R. 3896, an act to provide for immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates, and for other purposes, was passed by the Senate. This is the bill known as the "bonus bill." At this time I ask unanimous consent to withdraw that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and the motion is withdrawn.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Oklahoma to ask unanimous consent to withdraw only one motion, and I think he made several.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I understand that the granting of the request to withdraw the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed automatically kills the other motions I have entered. If not, of course the position of the Senator from Wisconsin would be good. As a parliamentary inquiry I ask whether my position is not correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised by the parliamentary clerk that the Senator's position is correct.

NAVY DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. BYRNES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 7672, being the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, there is considerable confusion in the Senate Chamber. What is the nature of the bill?

Mr. BYRNES. It is the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. BORAH. Is it the purpose of the Senator from South Carolina to ask for its immediate consideration?

Mr. BYRNES. I move that the Senate proceed to consider House bill 7672, and make it the unfinished business.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is my intention to move that the Senate recess until Monday at 12 o'clock noon if the naval appropriation bill shall be taken up for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7672) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations, with amendments.

Mr. BYRNES. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

RETURN OF DOMESTIC ANIMALS DUTY FREE

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to submit a unanimous-consent request. This morning, from the Committee on Finance, there was reported back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 6143) to extend the time during which domestic animals which have crossed the boundary line into foreign countries may be returned duty free. It deals with an emergency matter. It is recommended by the proper department of the Government. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, some explanation should be made. Why should the bill be brought up this evening?

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, may I offer a word of explanation? A companion bill was introduced in the Senate by my late colleague, Mr. Cutting, and myself. The bill extends the time within which cattle taken into a foreign country may be brought back to the United States. Under the existing law the time is limited, and they must be returned within 8 months after being taken out of the United States. In my State, as we all know, and in adjoining States the drought last year required the sending of a great number of our cattle into the Republic of Mexico. Our ranges are not as yet in condition for the return of those cattle. The bill would give an additional time in which to return the cattle to the United States without the payment of duty.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, may I ask what additional time is provided?

Mr. HATCH. The bill provides an additional time of about 1 year.

Mr. McCARRAN. What protection is afforded in the bill for American cattle? In other words, certain American cattle were sent into the Republic of Mexico. What assurance have we that the same cattle or their increment will come back?

Mr. HATCH. They must be the same cattle. The cattle are tallied as they go into the Republic of Mexico, and the same cattle, with their increment, are returned. The general law covers that situation.

Mr. McCARRAN. Because of my respect for and confidence in the Senator from New Mexico I am not going to object, but it seems to me the bill might be subject to various objections. However, I believe the Senator from New Mexico is so well versed in the subject that I had rather yield to his judgment and let the bill pass.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi for the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 6443) to extend the time during which domestic animals which have crossed the boundary line into foreign countries may be returned duty free was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions of subparagraph (c) of paragraph 1606 of title II of the Tariff Act of 1930, horses, mules, asses, cattle, sheep, and other domestic animals, straying across the boundary line into any foreign country, or which have been driven across such boundary line by the owner for temporary pasturage purposes only, or which may so stray or be driven before November 1, 1935, and the offspring and increase of any such animals, whether or not accompanying the parent animals, shall be admitted free of duty under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, if brought into the United States at any time before June 30, 1936.

Mr. HATCH subsequently said: Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada propounded a question to me a moment ago about House bill 6143, which has just passed the Senate, the measure relating to bringing cattle back into the United States. I did not then have the exact information on the subject about which he inquired. I now have it. The bill provided that the time should be extended until June 30, 1936, a little more than a year. I told the Senator I believed it was about a year.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, the thought I had in mind, I will say to the Senator from New Mexico, is the same thought which of necessity he must have in mind and which the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], who stands by his side, must have in mind, and which everyone representing the cattle-producing and public-range States must have in mind, namely, do we get back the same cattle or the same number of cattle we sent out, together with their natural increment? If we are to get no more, I think we would have no objection, but if we are to get more, then, of course, we would all object. I think the Senator will agree to that statement.

Mr. HATCH. What the Senator from Nevada does not want is the importation of foreign beef into the United States, and I stand exactly where the Senator from Nevada stands on that proposition.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES—AUTHORIZATION TO SIGN BILL

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I understand the Senate will shortly recess or adjourn until Monday. In the regular course of business the so-called "bonus bill" would go back to the House for enrollment, there be signed by the Speaker, and then would have to come to the Senate for signature by the Vice President before it could go to the President. Inasmuch as we are to be in recess or adjournment for 2 or 3 days, I send to the desk a resolution for which I ask immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read. The legislative clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized to sign, after the recess of the Senate today, the enrolled bill H. R. 3896, the so-called "soldiers' adjusted-compensation bill."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, under the resolution the Senator has offered the bill could not go through the House until tomorrow and the Vice President would have no authority to sign it. Why does the Senator limit it to today?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suggest that the Senator from Oklahoma merely submit the request that during the recess of the Senate the Vice President may sign the bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The wording of the resolution is perfectly clear. It merely authorizes the Vice President "to sign after the recess of the Senate today" the so-called "soldiers' adjusted-compensation bill."

Mr. NORRIS. I did not understand it that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma for the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

FARMERS' VISIT TO WASHINGTON

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I send to the desk a telegram which I ask the clerk to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

CINCINNATI, OHIO, May 16, 1935.

HON. TOM CONNALLY,

Senate Office Building:

Please say to Senator HASTINGS in reply to insinuations made on Senate floor that farmers who met in Washington to thank the administration for its support in lifting agriculture out of slough of despond that farmers in attendance paid their own expenses, hired Constitution Hall at cash of in excess of $800 for two meetings, and were cordially invited to listen to our beloved President from White House balcony. Why should anyone think we have exhausted our efforts with this puny attendance? Let him guarantee their expenses and we will send up five million. Please read this on Senate floor.

MISSOURI DELEGATION.

WAGES OF LABOR UNDER WORKS PROGRAM

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in the New York Times of today, Thursday, May 16, there appeared an article under the headline "Thirty percent pay cut asked under works plan. Tentative proposal is made to Roosevelt for slash from prevailing rates." I ask that the article in its entirety, being about one column in length, be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of May 16, 1935]

THIRTY PERCENT PAY CUT ASKED UNDER WORKS PLAN—TENTATIVE PROPOSAL IS MADE TO ROOSEVELT FOR SLASH FROM PREVAILING RATES—VARYING LEVELS PROVIDED—COUNTRY WOULD BE DIVIDED AND SKILLED, UNSKILLED, AND INTERMEDIATE CLASSES ARE SUGGESTED

WASHINGTON, May 15.—A basic framework for labor's wages under the $4,000,000,000 work program, calling for a 30 percent slash in prevailing hourly rates on construction jobs, tonight was disclosed to have been drawn tentatively for White House approval.

Emphasizing that President Roosevelt has yet to approve the proposal, a high official, who would not permit use of his name, said that monthly payments were expected to vary from $16 for unskilled labor in the South to $96 for a skilled workman in New York City.

The average, he said, would exceed the $50-a-month security wage on which the work program was planned. It compares with a monthly average of $29.50 on jobs now conducted under the Relief Administration, on which prevailing wages are paid, but which provide only enough employment given to meet a worker family's relief needs.

Still undetermined in the tentative schedule were the monthly allotment of work hours to labor and the total cost of labor's share of the outlays. Detailed wage regulations were expected to be submitted to the White House shortly by Harry L. Hopkins, works progress director.

The official quoted said that present plans called for three classifications of workers, with gradations in pay. Separate wage schedules would be provided for the six major regions, still undisclosed, into which the country has been divided.

THREE HUNDRED AND TWENTY WORK AREAS MARKED OUT

In some quarters it was said the new wage scales, which are to apply to all relief jobless, with the exception of the Civilian Conservation Corps, will be modified to fit conditions in 320 work areas already marked out by Mr. Hopkins. A survey of the cost of living for low-income families in 59 representative cities was to be completed shortly.

Present Public Works regulations provide minimum rates for two classes of labor—skilled and unskilled in the northern, central, and southern zones—but require payment of prevailing union wages if the latter are higher.

The new works schedule would set up an intermediate class of semiskilled workers, with pay about midway between the skilled and unskilled.

If the President approves the 30-percent reduction, officials said that payments will range from 29 cents to 35 cents an hour for common labor, from 50 to 60 cents for semiskilled, and from 70 to 85 cents for skilled. These were described as falling 30 percent below Public Works Administration averages based on prevailing rates.

At present the P. W. A. minimum ranges from 40 cents for unskilled and $1 for skilled in the southern zone to 45 cents and $1.10 in the central and 50 cents and $1.20 in the northern zones.

WHITE-COLLAR JOBS TO BE FOUND

Most of the 750,000 white-collar people now on relief were said to fall in the skilled and semiskilled classes. These were to receive research or administrative work.

Some difficulties in carrying out the wage schedule were foreseen by officials from the fact that present scales were to be continued on P. W. A. projects already under construction or contract.

The McCarran amendment, which would have required that prevailing wages be paid under the $4,000,000,000 program, was defeated in the Senate after administration leaders contended it would destroy work plans. A compromise was adopted instructing the President to increase payments if the prevailing wage was being broken down and to pay prevailing wages on Federal construction.

What wage would be paid if factories supplying materials and equipment should be required to fill jobs from relief rolls also was said to be undecided.

The proposal was offered by officials who contended that the work program otherwise would not substantially benefit mining and similar areas.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I desire now, in keeping with the pronouncement made in that article, to read into the RECORD again a letter over the signature of the President, of date February 21 of this year, addressed to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], in which the President said:

In response to your telephonic inquiry, I am very glad to repeat what I told you and several members of your committee last week.

Every action of the administration during the past 2 years has been directed, first, to the objective of raising wage scales, which, from the point of view of public interest, were set at unconscionably low levels; and, secondly, we have constantly followed the objective of preventing reductions in existing wage scales.

There is more to the letter, Mr. President. I ask that the entire letter follow the excerpt which I have inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 21, 1935.

DEAR SENATOR GLASS: In response to your telephonic inquiry, I am very glad to repeat what I told you and several members of your committee last week.

Every action of the administration during the past 2 years has been directed, first, to the objective of raising wage scales which, from the point of view of public interest, were set at unconscionably low levels; and, secondly, we have constantly followed the objective of preventing reductions in existing wage scales.

So much for that, except that I might add that both of these objectives are constantly before us and will continue so to be.

As you are aware, the practical operation of the principle of collective bargaining, plus the operation of the National Industrial Recovery Act, have in the overwhelming majority of cases of organized and unorganized labor either raised wages or prevented any reduction in wages.

I object to and deny any assertion that the payment of wages to workers now on the relief rolls at less than the prevailing rate of wages may, under some theory, result in a lowering of wages paid by private employers. I say this because it is an obvious fact—first, that the Federal Government and every State government will act to prevent reductions; and, secondly, because public opinion throughout the country will not sustain reductions.

I have enough faith in the country to believe that practically 100 percent of employers are patriotic enough to prevent the lowering of wages. In this thought they will have the full support of the Government.

I think that the record of this administration has demonstrated that in the administering of this legislation I will not permit anything to be done that will result in lowering the wage scale of the Nation.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. McCARRAN. Then, Mr. President, on that date the able senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], having the floor, said, among other things:

I repeat, I do not see how gentlemen here who have given us an exhibition of rhetorical commendation of the President can now have so little confidence in him as not to believe what he has said to the committee and now says, through me, to the Senate, that he is not going to permit the things to be done which they apprehend, and therefore they are going to vote for the McCarran amendment.

Following that, Mr. President, I desire to read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 15, in which the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] saw fit, in his splendid way, to change his position and vote against the amendment then pending. He said:

I still fear there will be grievous consequences if less than the prevailing wage is paid in any substantial areas where work is done under this joint resolution.

Following that, I desire to read from the speech of the able junior Senator from New York, wherein he said—and I refer again to the RECORD of March 15, at page 3692:

In view of the incontestable truth that wages seek the lowest level, I feel sure that this language imposes upon President Roosevelt the obligation in most instances to set substantially the prevailing rate.

Again, Mr. President, I draw the attention of the Senate to the RECORD of the same date—to wit, March 15—at page 3692, in which the junior Senator from New York said, among other things:

I am of the opinion that any wage fixed by the President which would be substantially below the wage paid in private industry would at once bring the wage of private industry down to the level fixed. Therefore, to carry out the mandate of the President, in my opinion—and I am rather certain of my convictions upon the subject—practically the prevailing rate of wage will be paid.

On the same date the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], in a colloquy between himself and the able Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], said, among other things:

Does the Senator from Wyoming believe that the so-called compromise amendment of the Senator from Georgia will result in maintaining the prevailing wage in this country?

To which the able Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] said, "I do."

Mr. President, I said on the floor of the Senate on that day and on previous days that there was a movement, insidious in its activity, to tear down the prevailing wage structure of the country, and if the report which I have inserted in the RECORD today—and the publication in which it appears is not the only one which carries it—is true in any part whatever, then we are only on the threshold of what seems to me to be an avalanche designed to tear down the standard of living of the American worker. If we tear down the standard of living of the American worker, then we tear down the standard of existence of every business in the country, because every dollar that the worker earns goes into business; and when we tear down the standard of wages, we tear down the standard of living; and when we tear down the standard of living every business must of necessity suffer.

Mr. President, I wish to say now that, in keeping with his great record, I do not believe the President of the United States, the President who stands today responsible for democracy, will permit either Mr. Hopkins or anyone else to induce him to do that which he has not done in the emergency through which we have passed in the past 2 years. I do not believe Mr. Hopkins can prevail upon the President to do it; and I am now saying in this body, in order that we may understand each other, under the courtesy of the very kind and gracious Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], that if this movement, augmented and put forth by Mr. Hopkins, is to prevail, there is not enough force between here and perdition to save democracy in the years to come, because democracy has always leaned with its entire weight upon the toilers of this country; and if the earnings of the toilers are to be cut down, and the prevailing wage structure is to be destroyed, then I wonder where democracy will find a safe resting place in the years to come.

Mr. President, I lay this matter before the Senate, together with the excerpts I have read, as a preliminary to an effort which I propose to continue; because, if the wage structure of this country is to be torn down, if there is not another Senator—and I know I am not alone—who will stand on the floor of the Senate to make a battle for the under dog, there will be at least one to insist that the wage structure of the country shall be maintained, so that the toilers of America shall not be reduced to the degradation of the serfdom of Japan and Russia, and so that the American standard of living may endure.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. LEWIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported favorably the nomination of Morris L. Cooke, of Pennsylvania, to be Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration.

He also, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nomination of R. Waldo Wetengel to be postmaster at Rush Springs, Okla., in place of J. L. Coyle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MALONEY in the chair). The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the calendar is in order.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Leo F. Sanchez to be register of the land office, Santa Fe, N. Mex.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

COAST GUARD

The legislative clerk read the nomination of LeRoy Reinburg to be captain in the Coast Guard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Elmer F. Stone to be commander in the Coast Guard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. LEWIS. I ask that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire to bring to the attention of the Senate the fact that there has been nominated to be United States district attorney for the northern district of Illinois the Honorable MICHAEL L. IGOE, Representative at large for the State of Illinois. The report from the Committee on the Judiciary favoring his confirmation was handed to my colleague the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH]. I have been informed by my colleague that he was called to the University of Virginia because of the illness of his son, and I am inclined to think, from what I have heard, that the report is in his pocket.

The district attorney now in the office, Mr. Dwight H. Green, has resigned and wishes to leave the office; the Attorney General is very anxious to have the position filled, and I am compelled to ask the Senate to indulge me that I may move the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Igoe upon the report of the Committee on the Judiciary.

I should like to say to the Senate that the Senators from Illinois, all the Representatives, the Governor of the State, and the citizens of Chicago endorse Mr. Igoe, and he is very worthy. The present incumbent of the office is a very high-class gentleman, and as he is about to enter into some sort of partnership, to start on Monday, there is no one to take charge of the office, and I desire to move the confirmation of Mr. Igoe's nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the request should be that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the nomination.

Mr. LEWIS. I should not like to ask that the committee be discharged. The report has been made, and it is in the pocket of my colleague.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands, it is not in order to ask for the confirmation. The Senate does not have the authority to grant such a request. The Senate has not the report of the committee.

Mr. LEWIS. The report is not here. I am informed that it is in the pocket of my colleague. The Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], informed me that the report was in the possession of my colleague, and when I attempted to get in touch with my colleague I found that some unhappy illness had befallen one of the members of his family which called him away from the city.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that the only way to accomplish what the Senator from Illinois desires is to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from the further consideration of the nomination.

Mr. LEWIS. I do not wish to do anything that looks like a discourtesy. That is what I am seeking to avoid. As the Senate is to take a recess until Monday, I should like to have the new district attorney confirmed so that he may take his oath on Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is further advised that a motion to discharge the committee would not be a discourtesy, and that such action is often taken.

Mr. LEWIS. If that is the procedure, I ask that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Committee on the Judiciary is discharged from the further consideration of the nomination of MICHAEL L. IGOE to be United States attorney for the northern district of Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I now ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the nomination?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, what is the office?

Mr. LEWIS. United States attorney for the northern district of Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be stated.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of MICHAEL L. IGOE, of Illinois, to be United States attorney, northern district of Illinois.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, it seems to me it is a rather unusual procedure to discharge a committee from the consideration of a matter when the chairman of the committee is not present.

Mr. LEWIS. The chairman of the committee saw me, and explained to me that he was going to be absent. My colleague and I are anxious to have Mr. IGOE take his oath of office on Monday, the office being vacant, the previous occupant having resigned and having formed a connection to start Monday. In view of the fact that the Senate is about to take a recess until Monday, I asked unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the nomination, and that Mr. IGOE be unanimously confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. WHEELER. The nomination has been reported by the committee?

Mr. LEWIS. It was reported favorably by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the Senate advise and consent to the nomination?

The nomination was unanimously confirmed.

Mr. LEWIS. I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the President will be notified.

RECESS TO MONDAY

Mr. BYRNES. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m.) the Senate, in legislative session, took a recess until Monday, May 20, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate May 16 (legislative day of May 13), 1935

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY

Michael L. Igoe to be United States attorney, northern district of Illinois.

REGISTER OF LAND OFFICE

Leo F. Sanchez to be register of the land office, Santa Fe, N. Mex.

PROMOTIONS IN THE COAST GUARD

LeRoy Reinburg to be captain.

Elmer F. Stone to be commander.

POSTMASTERS

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, MAY 16, 1935

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Thanks be unto God, our Father, for His unspeakable gift to the world. He alone is truly great who lives in the fear of God and in the spirit of the Galilean Teacher. Beget in us a supreme passion for a life of large ideals, of profound emotions and sweet and abiding friendships. Allow no pride or carelessness to cause us to regard lightly the wonderful securities of virtue. Write in our hearts the Ten Statutes of Sinai. They are perfect in their character and perpetual in their obligation, and in keeping them there is great reward. Bow down Thy ear, O Lord, and hear. Do Thou cleanse and uplift the cities of our country; may they heed Thy law; every sin that blasts and kills is condemned by it, and every inspiration that saves flows from Thy immortal word. We praise Thee that Thy kingdom is an everlasting kingdom and Thy dominion endureth forever. Through Christ our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

THE ONLY SOLUTION OF THE RAILROAD PROBLEM

Mr. HILDEBRANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILDEBRANDT. Mr. Speaker, in clear, direct language that every Member of both Houses of Congress should profit by, Mr. J. G. Luhrsens, of Chicago, secretary-treasurer of the Railway Labor Executives' Association, and president of the American Train Dispatchers' Association, has pointed out the only solution of the railroad problem.

It is the solution involved in the bill of Senator WHEELER for Government ownership of railroads. It is the solution that far-visioned economists have been advocating for years.

Mr. Luhrsens's statement, which lies before me, contains these forceful and unanswerable assertions:

I am convinced that Government ownership is the only solution from the standpoint of the railroad workers.

Curtailments of railroad service are inevitable under the present vicious circle, and curtailments mean fewer jobs.

Today 45,000 miles of railroads are in receivership. There will and should be others, because they cannot make their fixed charges on top-heavy financial structures.

The Government is continuing to pour money into them. While doing this, it is encouraging curtailments so that its investment will be protected.

Eventually the curtailments will reach a point where Government ownership will be the only means of protecting the workmen and providing adequate service.

It is not necessary for me to tell my colleagues in Congress that the Supreme Court's adverse decision on the Railroad Pension Act has given impetus to the movement for Government ownership of railroads. Mr. Luhrsens, from whom I have quoted, believes that the decision of the high tribunal closes the door against any pension system in which the railroads are compulsory contributors—at least, until there is at least one change among members of the Court. He is also convinced that, instead of trying to provide pensions under the prevailing arrangement of private ownership of the roads, it would be better for the Government to take them over and initiate a system that would not only include a fair pension allowance but would also assure the public of efficient service at a minimum of cost and the workers of wages adequate to enable them to enjoy the comforts as well as have the bare necessities.

On some other occasion I shall refer to the reactionary effects of many of the decisions of the Supreme Court and the frequency with which the Court has discovered that social-justice legislation is unconstitutional. Other Congressmen have more than once shown that the founding fathers never intended to have the Supreme Court exercise any such veto power over legislation and that arrogated to itself this power without any legal sanction. Of this I shall also speak later. Just now it is sufficient to say that an utterly reactionary decision, which is apparently aimed at all social-security legislation, as well as this particular act, will be likely to tremendously speed up the movement for Government ownership of railroads.

I do not suffer from any illusion that the Supreme Court sought this end. But regardless of its intentions, it has contributed toward such an objective. That is about the only complimentary comment that can be made regarding the Court's decision. Accidentally the foes of progress sometimes give material assistance to the cause they meant to retard. Perhaps this is again happening and history once more repeats itself.

THE BEAVER-MAHONING CANAL

Mr. CROSBY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CROSBY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state my reasons for opposing the proposed construction of the Beaver-Mahoning Canal, as recommended by the Chief of Engineers, War Department, and included in the omnibus bill for the improvement of rivers and harbors throughout the United States, now before the Senate for consideration.

First. All the Army engineers who made first-hand investigation recommended against it as uneconomical, with the exception of the Chief of Army Engineers and Board of Army Engineers, who reversed all the others and recommended it as favorable; but this final favorable report contains so many provisos and inaccuracies as really to be an adverse report.

Second. It will take from the railroads running from the Pittsburgh district to Youngstown the greater part of their traffic, and will practically put them out of business.

Third. It will prevent coal miners who do not have mines or tipples on the rivers from selling coal in Youngstown, thereby lessening their production, and causing them to operate with many less coal miners and employees.

Fourth. Instead of increasing employment, which is alleged as one of its main justifications, it will by transferring the traffic of two steel mills from railroads to the canal, actually put permanently out of railroad service 3,500 men, consisting of engine and trainmen, trackmen, shopmen, and others.

Fifth. It is solely to enable two steel mills at Struthers, Ohio, to procure coal and limestone without railroad service, and at the cost of the taxpayers.

Sixth. While these shipments may be made at less cost to the producers and consumers, the actual cost will be paid by the taxpayers and local communities, and will exceed railroad charges for the same traffic, this being a subsidy to the two steel mills.

Seventh. Many industries along the canal will be so damaged by the construction as to render them unfit for operation, and some have already signified their intention to cease operation, which will throw their employees out of work.

Eighth. Coal producers in Ohio, who produced 11,000,000 tons in 1934, have joined an association to oppose it, as they will lose large markets for their coal.

Ninth. The railroads which would be affected by this canal are now paying more than $8,000,000 in taxes to the State and local treasuries.

RENT CONDITIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech I delivered on the rent situation in the city of Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech I delivered at protest meeting against high rents in Washington, D. C., Thursday, April 25, 1935:

This is the first time I have had the privilege to speak at a mass meeting of my constituents in the District of Columbia. Under the Constitution, the Congress exercises for the citizens of the District of Columbia the functions of the State and of the National Legislature. Therefore every citizen—indeed, every resident of the District of Columbia—is a constituent of mine. I am bound, by virtue of my oath and by virtue of my office, to legislate justly and fairly for the people of the District of Columbia, and I intend to carry out that obligation to the best of my ability.

THE HEAVY BURDEN OF THE SMALL-HOME OWNER

Ever since I have come to the Congress I have worked continuously and persistently to improve the plight of the home owners, to lessen the burden of debt against their properties, to stop the foreclosures of their homes, and to generally improve their conditions.

I have no quarrel with, and indeed I warmly sympathize and intend to aid and assist those who own real property for rental to tenants, provided that they are willing to charge a fair and just rental—a rental commensurate with the real investment in or a fair value of their properties, but I, for one, will fight against excessive or exorbitant rentals. I shall fight rentals which cannot be justified either by the investment in or by the fair value of the property. The rental conditions in the District of Columbia are becoming oppressive and burdensome to private and to public employees who must live in the District of Columbia. Moreover, the acute housing shortage and high rentals are interfering with the efficient and proper functioning of the employees of the Federal Government living in the District of Columbia. In the interests of the efficient operation of the regular and emergency departments of the Government of the United States these conditions should be eliminated.

THE HOUSING SITUATION IN WASHINGTON

For some time past the housing shortage in the District of Columbia has been acute. There have been less than 200 vacant apartments of any kind. Many employees of the Government, whose work is essential to the proper conduct of the affairs of the Government of the United States have been unable to find living quarters in the city of Washington at a rental which they can afford to pay, and often at any rental.

There are 104 machinists working at the navy yards in essential and necessary occupations who are forced to live in the city of Baltimore, more than 40 miles away. I know of employees who must travel to their work 40 to 45 miles each morning and the same distance each evening, a total of 80 to 90 miles a day.

Such a long journey to and from work undermines the health and energy of these public employees and interferes with the efficient performance of their duties in the Government of the United States; thus it interferes with the proper functioning of the Government of the United States and is a matter of serious concern to the Congress.

UNSCRUPULOUS LANDLORDS

As I said, I have no quarrel with the legitimate landlord who is content to obtain a reasonable return on his investments and a fair rent for the use of his premises. My quarrel is with those landlords who have in the last few months increased their rents in many cases as high as 50 percent. Washington should be a model to the Nation in housing. It should have modern and sanitary homes in attractive surroundings at fair rentals. Instead of being a model to the Nation, it has unspeakable slums, crowded alley dwellings, and wide-spread blighted areas.

HOW FAMILIES ON RELIEF LIVE

A very interesting study was made last year under the auspices of the Board of Public Welfare of the District of Columbia. It examined the housing conditions of 6,596 families on relief. Of those, only 1,454 lived in houses with electricity. Only 3,357, or 44.4 percent had bathroom facilities which were adequate. In 2,437 cases the families were compelled to share a single bathtub with other families. Although these 6,595 families lived in what should properly be called "slums" they spend over a million dollars a year out of their relief money on rents.

I want to quote a paragraph from the letter accompanying the report covering this study. It reads:

"Next to the matter of overcrowding and lack of proper sanitary facilities, the subject which stands out is the fact that an unjustifiable amount of rent is paid for hundreds of really uninhabitable dwellings. Rentals are at least 45 percent higher in Washington than in the other cities of the United States."

The families on relief are not the only ones who suffer from overcrowded quarters and excessive rentals. That is a condition which is widespread in the city of Washington.

The complaints from the people of the District of Columbia and from those who visit the Nation's Capital have become so numerous, so persistent, and so well based on facts that they can no longer be ignored.

PROPOSED REMEDIAL LEGISLATION

I understand that it is the purpose of this mass meeting not only to protest against existing conditions but also to seek out remedies and to present an appropriate solution of the conditions confronting the District of Columbia. I want to submit my own personal thoughts on legislation which I feel is necessary to deal with this situation. The legislation which I desire to submit falls into two parts:

First, temporary legislation to protect the people of the District and the Federal employees during the duration of the emergency and until the housing shortage has disappeared and rents have become stabilized upon a fair basis. H. R. 3809 is designed as such emergency legislation. It establishes a rent commission in the District of Columbia. The commission is to have power to increase or decrease the rents after full consideration of the fair and reasonable value of the property, of its character and condition, and of the character of the service, if any, furnished in connection therewith. The commission shall allow to the owner of the property a fair return upon his investment.

This is the substance of my bill, H. R. 3809.

It has been asserted that the bill is unconstitutional. Such an assertion is based upon ignorance or malice. The same rent commission—the same legislation—has been held to be constitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Block against Hirsh, decided in 1921, and reported in Two Hundred and Fifty-sixth United States Reports, page 135.

The passage of H. R. 3809 is necessary as emergency legislation for the purpose of preventing further increases in rents, where they are unjustified. This cannot be criticized by those landlords who desire to charge fair and equitable rents, because under this legislation the interest of the property owner will be fully and adequately protected. A fair rent based on the fair value of the property should be and will be allowed.

H. R. 3809 is temporary emergency legislation. If it fails of passage, the city of Washington will experience, after the adjournment of this session of Congress, the increase of the present level of rents to fantastic heights. It is only the fact that this bill has been pending and the threat of its enactment which has protected the people of Washington against many unjustified rent increases, which had been planned by apartment owners and which have been only temporarily set aside.

H. R. 3809 should be passed as a protective measure until the housing shortage has been met by new buildings.

NEW HOUSING BADLY NEEDED

Second. What the city of Washington needs is the building of new homes, the building of low-cost housing available to Government employees, the building of modern and decent homes with adequate light, air, sunshine, and garden and playground facilities. Community housing projects which would stand as a model to the Nation are a crying need for the District of Columbia. Private enterprises and speculative real-estate interests have never been able to and never will be able to meet the housing needs for families with low incomes. Modern low-cost housing can only be constructed with the aid and assistance of the Federal Government and of local housing authorities. This is provided for in H. R. 7399.

A PERMANENT HOUSING AGENCY IS PROVIDED FOR IN H. R. 7399

H. R. 7399 sets up the administrative machinery and provides for the necessary funds to give to the people of the United States modern housing, real homes, sunny and airy homes at low cost.

There has been much talk and discussion concerning housing, some of it sound and some of it just ballyhoo. But what we need is not talk but action. We must have a permanent, independent housing agency in the United States. Only in that way will we get modern, large-scale, low-cost housing. Housing must be carried on as a matter of permanent policy and not as an emergency measure. Therefore, H. R. 7399 establishes the United States Housing Authority as a body corporate, with sufficient powers and funds to carry out, either directly or through local housing agencies, large-scale community housing projects for families of low or modest incomes.

This bill has been endorsed by many building-trades councils, by central labor unions, and by other organizations.

We speak of an American standard of living. We do have a high standard of living in the United States, but as far as housing is concerned, we are many years behind Europe. Immediately after the war there was a housing shortage in Europe just as there was one in America, but there was also a very strong and persistent public demand for Government housing measures which would give decent and modern housing at a cost or at rentals which workers and employees of low income could pay.

If we add up the housing achievements of several European nations with a combined population just about equaling that of the United States, we find that they have built some four and a half million new homes with Government aid and removed from the ordinary speculative field of private enterprise, with standards higher than almost anything built at any price in America, and with rentals available to industrial and white-collar workers.

Many economists moreover believe that the public housing activities in Europe have been the most important individual factor in fighting unemployment over there.

NEW CONSTRUCTION MUST BE ENCOURAGED

If we want modern, large-scale, low-cost housing in the United States, we should enact H. R. 7399 and establish the United States Housing Authority.

New construction, both by private capital and with Government aid, is the only permanent solution of the present situation of high rents for what are in most instances unsatisfactory homes.

New construction will not only terminate the present rent emergency; it will revive the construction industry, provide employment, and stimulate national recovery.

The people living in the city of Washington, whether they are Government employees or private citizens, whether they come to live here permanently or only come to visit for a few days, for a few weeks, or for a few months, are entitled to modern, decent homes, to homes full of light, sunshine, and air, to homes amidst lawns, trees, and gardens at fair and reasonable rentals.

In the emergency created by the depression, for the purpose of bringing recovery to a stricken people, and under the authority of laws passed by Congress, the Federal Government has established emergency agencies which have brought thousands of additional Government employees into Washington.

HEAVY POPULATION INCREASES MAKE RENT CONTROL IMPERATIVE

On February 28, 1933, there were employed in the District of Columbia in the executive branches of the Federal Government 66,802 persons. That number increased to 79,913 as of February 28, 1934, and to 95,517 as of February 28, 1935.

Within the last 2 years the Federal Government has thus brought an additional 28,715 employees into the District of Columbia.

The vast majority of these employees have been brought from outside of the District—from all the 48 States of the Union.

Since the Federal Government brought these nearly 30,000 people into the District of Columbia, it is the duty of the Federal Government to see that adequate, proper, and decent housing facilities at a fair price are available to them.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is House Resolution 219, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 219

Resolved, That the Attorney General of the United States is hereby directed to transmit to the House of Representatives at the earliest practicable moment the following information, viz:

First. Copies of all official information on file in the Department of Justice or in possession of its agents concerning the kidnapping of David Levinson and Robert Minor in Plaza Center of Gallup, N. Mex., on May 2, 1935.

Second. Whether any person or persons have been apprehended or taken in custody charged with the crime of kidnapping said David Levinson and Robert Minor, and if not whether the Department of Justice has instituted and prosecuted an investigation of said kidnapping with a view to bringing to justice those guilty of the crime of violating the act forbidding the transportation of kidnapped persons in interstate commerce, or to any Territory of the United States, approved June 22, 1932 (U. S. C., ch. 271, title 18, sec. 408a), as amended by the act of May 18, 1934 (Public No. 232, 73d Cong.).

Third. Name or names of any and all persons questioned in connection with said investigation and statements made by them.

Fourth. Whether or not said crime was completed within Navajo Indian Reservation, western New Mexico.

Fifth. Whether said Navajo Indian Reservation is under the jurisdiction of the United States Government and, if so, has not the Attorney General authority to prosecute those guilty of crime committed within said territory?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I thought I would not make my point of order unless the motion to table should fail.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order and ask that the gentleman state his point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this resolution is not such a resolution of inquiry as comes within the rules of the House; it goes far beyond a resolution of inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman specify what part of the resolution is not privileged?

Mr. BLANTON. The resolution asks for State testimony given in New Mexico, with which the Department of Justice has no connection. The Attorney General is not in possession of the testimony of witnesses given in New Mexico. The resolution goes far beyond a resolution of inquiry in several particulars, if the Speaker will note.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, may I be heard on the point of order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

The Chair holds that the resolution is simply a resolution of inquiry asking for information of the Department of Justice. The resolution asks for no information not in the possession of the Department. It seems to the Chair that it is clearly a privileged resolution under the rules of the House.

The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the report of the committee contains practically all the information requested in the resolution, which report has been available for the last couple of days, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MARCANTONIO) there were—ayes 59, noes 14.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 276, nays 40, not voting 115, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, I submit a privileged report, House Resolution 217, and ask that the resolution be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 217

Resolved, That the Secretary of Labor is hereby directed to furnish forthwith to the House of Representatives the annual report for the Department of Labor covering the fiscal year 1934 as required by the Organic Act of March 4, 1913 (37 Stat. 738), which provides that: "The Secretary of Labor shall annually, at the close of each fiscal year, make a report in writing to Congress, giving an account of all moneys received and disbursed by him and his Department and describing the work done by the Department."

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I may state that the adverse report of the committee is based upon a communication from the Secretary of Labor advising that the annual report will be printed and ready for general distribution in about 10 days.

I may state also that I have conferred with the author of the resolution, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON], and with the minority members of the committee and with the minority leader. I understand the information contained in the report is satisfactory.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I would like to ask whether or not this report shows any reason why the Secretary of Labor has not submitted the annual report before this.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I may say to the gentleman from Ohio that the report of the committee shows that she stated the delay was due to the fact that there has been delay on account of collecting statistics.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to a bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 1776. An act granting a leave of absence to settlers of homestead lands during the year 1935.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL, 1936

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8021) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes. Pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill shall conclude not later than 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon, the time to be equally divided and controlled by the gentleman from New Jersey and myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8021, with Mr. BULWINKLE in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD].

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have observed in the last few days that the discussion in the debate on this bill has taken somewhat of a political turn. I thought it might be appropriate to submit a few observations of a political character, and I trust that the membership will not ask me to yield until after I have finished my statement, at which time I shall be glad to enter into a friendly debate with anyone who might desire to submit questions or observations.

I admit that it is a little early to start the campaign for next year, because there is much yet to be accomplished, and it is pretty hard at this stage to close the issues of a campaign that will come to an election 18 months hence.

Many of our distinguished opponents have risen here from day to day calling the attention of the Members of the House and to the country to what they think are the weaknesses in the constructive program of legislation that the present administration has enacted to help bring the country out of the depression and back to normal conditions.

Mr. Chairman, we all recall the dark days of February 1933, the close of the former administration, when hunger, despair, unemployment, and chaos clouded our land. We recall when the present party came into power with a new leader who was commissioned to lead this country out of the valley of despair. Even on the day of inauguration, box-car headlines in the papers were calling attention to the fact that banks had failed. Several of the States had declared moratoriums. Banks had closed their doors to the depositors. Despair was evidenced on every hand. All of us, as legislators, were wondering what would be the next tragic event in the affairs of our Nation. We recall on the day of the inauguration, when this newly commissioned leader sent his message to the country, that all we needed to fear was fear itself. The new President started in immediately to remedy the situation which was so tragic and which had the country in the throes of despair. He closed the doors of every bank, made a complete examination as to their solvency, and allowed them to open only after they had demonstrated their capacity to pay depositors and transact their business as solvent institutions. This was a courageous act on the part of our Chief Executive, but was absolutely necessary because of the emergency which he had inherited from the former administration. From that hour to this we have added to the strength of our banking system, with the help of funds from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which were loaned to these institutions to carry them through the dark hours when bankruptcy and the closing of their doors was before them. We have recently enacted what the old commoner from Nebraska advocated 30 years ago as a law to guarantee the depositors of banks that they might know the Federal Government that sets up this banking structure is willing to devise a system that will stand behind those institutions and make it sound and secure.

We have recently reenacted a law guaranteeing the deposits of banks, which takes care of 98 percent of the depositors. I believe the gentleman on the opposition will agree with me that the whole banking structure of America today is as sound and secure as at any time within the recollection of anyone in my presence. Upon this basis of revamping our banking system billions of deposits have come out of seclusion and have found their way back into the banks, until today there is an abundance of money to transact the business of America. Confidence has been restored. Our Republican headliners in this House would have you believe this program of constructive legislation has achieved nothing, but I would like to take an inventory as I have of the banking situation and give you a few of the achievements of the present administration.

What was the condition of agriculture at the beginning of this administration in 1933? Why are farmers here to the number of 4,500 to express their appreciation to the present head of the Democratic administration? It grows out of a comparison of the prices of farm products, with a new hope of victory, and with a new outlook on life on the farm. Can anyone recall when under a Republican administration any delegation of farmers to that extent came to express their appreciation of the service that had been given to them?

I recall, as you do, that under the administration of Mr. Hoover hogs were selling for as low as 2½ cents a pound. I recall that corn in my district sold at 11 cents a bushel and wheat at 30 cents a bushel. Can any farmer be expected to pay taxes, and pay interest on a mortgage debt that was created when farm prices were comparable to what they are now and receive a return, on farm prices as they were under the administration of Mr. Hoover?

The time was when the Republican Party assured the farmer, as it did the country, that there were two essential things to guarantee prosperity to the farmer and to the Nation. They said, "Give us a high protective tariff to keep out the products of foreign nations." They said, "Give us the gold standard and we will guarantee you prosperity." Under the administration of Mr. Hoover there was enacted what was known as the "Smoot-Hawley bill", which carried these tariff schedules to the highest figure known in the history of the Nation. At that time we were still upon the gold standard and yet the farmer, relying upon the guaranty, found himself with farm prices, as I have recited to you, which not only did not give him the cost of production, but created a loss every year that the farmer operated under those prices.

Under the present administration we have enacted the Agricultural Adjustment Act. Considerable criticism has been levied against this measure, but it is sound in principle, and I believe will be continued when brought before this House for action. It goes upon the theory that we must have national planning in agriculture as we have had in industry.

When there is a surplus of production in manufactured products, do the manufacturers continue to turn the wheels of industry and increase this surplus? Not at all; they begin to curtail their production. If the farmer could have organized on a cooperative basis through his own efforts years ago and controlled his production, he could have operated under the same national planning and processes as the manufacturer, but farming is too diversified to do this. The Agricultural Adjustment Act goes on the theory that the Government will assist the farmer to cooperate and curtail his production, and under this law the Federal Government undertakes to compensate every individual farmer who will sign a contract to curtail the production of a single product. For this cooperation with his Government, in the national planning to help all farmers, he is compensated for his reduction in acreage or in production.

Is there anything wrong about this? Since when, under the traditions of America, could not a farmer sign a contract with his Government, just as he may sign a contract with an individual, that he will conduct his farm on a cooperative basis so that it will be self-sustaining and render him a profit?

Oh, they complain that in carrying out this national planning you are levying a processing tax against the consumer. Should any Republican have the temerity to stand here and criticize the use of the taxing power of the Federal Government to help the farmer as it has been used for decades in levying a protective tariff to help the manufacturer? [Applause.] If you can levy a high protective tariff, not to raise revenue but as a barrier against manufactured products so that the manufacturer may control his output and raise his price, surely you can use the taxing power of the Federal Government to levy a processing tax to take care of the marketing conditions and the prices to the farmer on the domestic market. The principle is identical as the tariff.

The chief criticism comes because the act is working and bringing better prices and giving relief to the farmer.

No; we are going on with the system, and no one appreciates it more than these 4,500 farmers who are here to express their gratitude that at last a party has come into power that has remembered this group of forgotten men and women who live on the farm and is going to see to it that they are given the same treatment that has been given to other groups for many decades.

So there is a new hope and a new confidence on the farm. They see now a return from their production that will permit them to pay their taxes, reduce their mortgages, redeem their homes, purchase needed commodities, and again live as Americans.

What else has this administration done for the farmer? We have increased the powers and the appropriations of the Federal land bank, guaranteeing not only the interest but the principal of the bonds with an expansion of the lending program, and millions of farms have been saved from foreclosure, and the men and women still live on these family homesteads and are there, contented and happy, producing the foodstuffs that feed America.

We have not confined this service to the farmer. We have created the Home Owners' Loan Corporation that has carried these same benefits to men and women who have mortgages on their homes and live in cities and in suburban places. So we could organize, if we so desired, another parade not of 4,500 but of millions of men and women and children who could come here and thank this administration for enlarging the powers of the Federal land bank and the Home Owners' Loan Corporation that have saved their homes from foreclosure and changed a life of misery and despair to one of happiness and hope for the future. [Applause.]

As I have said, one of the old guarantees of prosperity under Republican administration was the maintenance of the gold standard or, as they said, of sound money. Who will say that the gold standard under Hoover was sound, or who will say that the gold dollar was an honest dollar. I think it was the most dishonest dollar we have ever had in the history of this Nation. Why? Because under its control, with the small supply of gold, as compared with the necessary volume of money to transact the ever-increasing volume of business in this country, gold became too scarce, too valuable, commodities measured in dollars were not commensurate with the previous parity, and the dollar was an unfair dollar.

No; the Democratic Party did not destroy the gold standard; it just died of general debility, because it had outlived its usefulness. What happens today? There is not one class of money that has any privileges over another, but gold, silver, or currency issued upon the credit of the United States stand upon an equality; and, so far as I am concerned, I am not a believer in gold or silver or any class of currency, but I believe in American money or legal money, where every dollar stands upon the same basis in the payment of debts and the purchasing of products, and is treated as the same creation of the Congress, which is now exercising its power under the Constitution to "coin money and regulate the value thereof", and we are doing it under this administration on an honest, just, and fair basis, which has not been done for years. The money is sound and the new system is functioning. [Applause.]

When creditors lent this money, did they lend gold? No; they lent American dollars to their debtors. They will now be paid in the same kind of dollars—American dollars—and cite me any place where the American dollar is not considered good money, because now it pays all debts, public and private, whether it be a gold dollar, a silver dollar, or a paper dollar. I am enough of a William Jennings Bryan Democrat to have always believed that every class of money issued by this Nation should be on a parity with every other class of money. Behind it is the full faith and credit of our Government, with all its resources, including its taxing power, which, after all, is the foundation upon which any monetary system is based.

So I believe that in fifty or a hundred years from now, when the historian or the economist looks over the achievements of this administration to select that particular measure that he believes made the greatest contribution to the future of our Nation, although many others are important in their field of service, my opinion is that he will put his finger on the change in our monetary system. This is our greatest contribution to a sound and permanent recovery.

Under the powers of Congress, under the Constitution, we gave the President authority to revalue gold and remonetize silver. He exercised that power. We were told that the devaluation of gold and the change in the monetary system would be disastrous, and yet we are going along with gold devalued, silver remonetized, and the American dollar is as sound today as any dollar we have had since the dawn of history in our Nation. [Applause.]

We have gone into the field of conservation. We are preserving our water power for all the people; not allowing it to be taken away, not allowing it to be seized as a privilege for a particular group to exploit the people.

The demonstration at Muscle Shoals and Boulder Dam has convinced the American people that these resources belong to all the people and should be developed, not allowing them to be appropriated by private monopolies, but applying, preserving, protecting them for the benefit of the public. The distress in the minds of many who believe in private ownership and close cooperation controlling these great resources is that in the manufacture of electric power by the Government we are demonstrating to what extent the service can be carried to the people of America at a reasonable cost.

We are commencing the next step for the electrification of rural communities. Come to think about it, why should not the farmer be entitled to electrical privileges just as we have been entitled to it in the city for many years? We have enough undeveloped electrical power in America to heat and light every farmer's home. The greatest resources we have is in the power of water of our Nation.

In the conservation plan of the Nation we are restoring our forests which have been wasted and practically exhausted by the thoughtlessness of previous generations. America needs to be tree conscious, it needs to appreciate the fact that we are losing our soil by erosion, changing our climate by lack of rainfall, which means in the future nothing but devastation.

America needs to become tree-minded, and we need to build up the forest reserves. The administration has the vision and is promoting this policy.

There is another resource yet to be conserved, and that is the youth of the land, the greatest resource of them all, upon which our future happiness rests, and the perpetuation of our Nation. So they are given an opportunity to go into the field of endeavor to rebuild the forests of our Nation.

Oh, the compensation will be great—in forests, in lumber, in soil, but above all of that, in the saving of the morale and the citizenship of these hundreds of thousands of young men who are finding useful employment in this hour of distress, who are working for their Nation, who are being paid in lessons of appreciation of a Nation which will give them this opportunity, when no other is open to them. It will take care of their citizenship, their mental and bodily strength, build them up as resources for the coming generation. This great constructive act, I am glad to say, is not one that has come very much under the criticism of the opposition, but which I have the privilege of reciting as another one of the great constructive acts of the administration that is saving the Nation and bringing us back out of the valley of depression. [Applause.]

We have given these constructive measures to the Nation. We have increased the national wealth in round numbers somewhere from around thirty-eight billion or forty billion dollars annually to in the neighborhood of $60,000,000,000, and as we march on in the progress and in the gains we are making from day to day, we hope to build up this value of annual increase in the national wealth to a figure which it has never yet reached, of perhaps $100,000,000,000. As this gain in wealth goes on, the debts that are being created are a mere bagatelle. After all, taxes are paid when wealth is increasing. The annual production of wealth is now increasing, but the mortgages that we are placing on the future in order to prime the pump will find their way back into the Treasury as a small percentage of the gains that we are making in the increase of our national wealth. No one is claiming on behalf of the administration that we are balancing the Budget or attempting to balance the Budget of the unusual expenditures which are an investment in the future, but we do say that so far as current expenses are concerned, we are approximately balancing the Budget, and that that offers a comparison with the $2,000,000,000 annual deficit under the Hoover administration for which he made no investment for the future, but which was a clear loss because he failed to balance the Budget. The American people are not worrying about the payment of these debts that are being created. A farmer who gets an increase for his production, a laborer who has a job does not object to making a contribution to their Government to help retire the national debt; but let the hour come when he has no employment, with no confidence in the future, with no income, with starvation staring him in the face, then a two billion deficit incurred in the expenses of the Government is a burden which cannot be met out of poverty, but which represents the insolvency of a nation.

Who would have the temerity to rise and say that America, when its bonds and securities are selling at par, at the lowest rate of annual interest, probably, in the memory of the country, when they are taken and taken readily with oversubscriptions every time they are offered—who would say there is no hope for the future stability of America to meet this indebtedness, which is an investment in our future security and future prosperity? So, Mr. Chairman, we are not worried with a failure to balance the Budget with these unusual expenditures that are being made. We have helped relieve the hungry and distressed. We have spent billions, and will anyone say that it is not the first obligation of any government to protect those who are in hunger, who are unhoused, who are unclothed, who are in distress? A government that fails to do that is not meeting up to the highest ideals and requirements of government which is a representative democracy based on the happiness and prosperity of its people. The administration is relieving those in hunger and distress while creating employment to make them self-sustaining.

So we are marching on under the new deal. The American people are appreciating it. The farmers are coming by the thousands to express their appreciation. Other groups can come. We ask you of the opposition to withhold your criticism until next year when the campaign is on. Let the valuation of these achievements be made by the American people after this Congress has adjourned and after the next Congress has adjourned, and that will be in plenty of time then to close the issues for the campaign of next year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes more to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. The President of the United States invites criticism. The gentleman from Indiana asks everyone to withhold criticism until the campaign next year. That is not in harmony with what the President suggests. I have always felt that wholesome criticism is good, and I fear that the gentleman is not speaking in harmony with his administration.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I agree with the gentleman that wholesome criticism is good.

Mr. MICHENER. The trouble is that we try to make politics out of everything in a campaign.

Mr. GREENWOOD. That is the point I make. Gentlemen who are spokesmen for the opposition rise here from day to day in general debate to criticize many of these measures that they have voted for themselves, and I am attempting to point out that these policies are successful, and that they are working, and that we should go on as you and your colleagues did a year ago, when you joined with us to help complete this program, instead, at this time, of trying to hamstring the administration not always by wholesome criticism, but by a great deal of what looks like political bushwhacking to me.

Mr. MICHENER. As a matter of fact, if we did go along and help you try an experiment for a time, yet now, when we honestly believe that the experiment which we helped you try is not working, why in the name of God should the gentleman object to us, who showed good faith in the beginning, pointing out defects to you now?

Mr. GREENWOOD. If you will continue that faith and go along with us, if next year in the campaign you have any remorse you want to express to your constituency, you can say, "Here is a measure that I voted for that I think was a mistake. I thought it would do so-and-so, but I find it does so-and-so"; then I shall have no fault to find.

Mr. MICHENER. But when we know today, does the gentleman not think it is our duty under our oaths to call attention to the mistakes, rather than to wait for a campaign next year, after the horse is stolen, after it is too late to accomplish anything?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I am not attempting to interpret the gentleman's duty. He has the same liberty that I have to rise on this floor and speak any criticism that he desires, but I am offering an argument to show that his criticism is futile. I think at this time we should be engaged in this constructive program of legislation, rather than dealing with politics. I made that comment in the beginning.

Mr. MICHENER. Ballyhoo is all right for a time, but when you see that it is not getting us anywhere, is it not common sense to get back to the ground?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Well, I do not agree with the gentleman that it is not getting us anywhere. This program is taking us out of the depression. In contrast with the program of Hoover and the gentleman's party, there is no comparison with your failures and our success. [Applause.]

Mr. DITTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. DITTER. Did the gentleman intend to infer that the regular expenses of Government are coming in as required by the Budget program?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I said approximately. I do not say that we are fully balancing the Budget.

Mr. DITTER. Could we suggest that the gentleman look into the naval operations?

Mr. GREENWOOD. The argument arose over the investment of funds which might be considered a future investment. The building of a navy under what we may think the necessities of the day is hardly to be considered current expenses, because that again is building for the future.

Mr. DITTER. But the gentleman would not include as an extraordinary item the matter of repairing buildings, or repairing wharves or docks as an item of future investment?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Well, we might have to look into each particular project. The gentleman and I might stand here and argue until doomsday about what we consider are extraordinary expenditures and ordinary expenditures and not reach an agreement.

Mr. DITTER. But I think the gentleman wanted to be fair.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I do want to be fair.

Mr. DITTER. I did not want the gentleman to misinterpret the facts as they actually are.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I want to say in that connection it is quite difficult sometimes to decide what is an extraordinary expenditure looking to the future, and what is a current expenditure. The gentleman's ideas might be one and mine might be another, but I say approximately, in the current expenses of the Government, the running expenses of the Government, we are more approximately balancing the Budget today than we did under the former administration of President Hoover.

Mr. COLDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. COLDEN. The gentleman mentioned in his remarks that during the Hoover administration hogs sold for $2.50 a hundred; corn, 11 cents a bushel, and wheat at 30 cents a bushel. Will the gentleman give the price of those articles at the present time?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I can only give them approximately. Hogs are selling in my home State at $7.50 to $8 a hundred; corn is worth 85 or 90 cents a bushel; wheat is in the neighborhood of 90 cents or a dollar.

Mr. COLDEN. Is not that a complete answer?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I think so. I think our farmers so consider it.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. Did I understand the gentleman to contend that in his colloquy with the gentleman from Michigan that the speech he has just concluded was not a political speech?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I started out by saying it was a political speech.

Mr. MOTT. I thought so. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GREENWOOD. It was made for political purposes, just as many on the opposition side have made such speeches.

Mr. MOTT. That is what I thought. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Indiana 2 additional minutes.

Mr. MICHENER. Something has been said about balancing the Budget, and the deficit under the Hoover administration. Of course, the gentleman takes into consideration the fact that during the Hoover administration all expenditures of Government were included in the amount appropriated; there was no emergency budget or relief budget and a regular operating budget, but there was only one Budget, so that today, if we include all expenditures in one Budget, under the same system of bookkeeping heretofore used in the country, the deficit would be appalling.

Mr. GREENWOOD. There is considerable academic argument about balancing the Budget and what is an extraordinary expenditure and what is an ordinary expenditure. The greatest regret I have is that your President and my President, Mr. Hoover, did not undertake a constructive program, as we have, that would help to bring this country back; that he was not willing to invest in the future, even by borrowing, in order to save this country industrially and economically. He made that mistake. I think that is the success of the present administration. Hold the line. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. PLUMLEY].

PATERNALISM, THE MOST SUBTLE AND SINISTER ENEMY OF POPULAR GOVERNMENT

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to take advantage of this occasion and opportunity in order to make a few observations and to go on record with respect to some matters and things which have given me great concern, and I know that others on both sides of the aisle are thinking along the same lines. The usurpation by the Executive of the functions and prerogatives of the legislative branch of the Government is a matter which has been much discussed. It is so contrary to the theory and principles on which this Government was established that we ought to take time to seriously consider where we are going if we continue to travel in this direction.

"The accumulation of all powers, legislative and executive, as well as control of the judiciary in the same hands, be they few or many, and whether self-appointed or elective, is a perfect definition of tyranny, and when the powers are so united there can be no liberty." I am talking about a situation and not about individuals, but if history teaches anything or we may learn from the lessons experience speaks, we must know and realize that of those who have overturned the liberties of republics the greatest number have begun their career by paying an obsequious court to the people. They have commenced as flattering lip-service demagogues and ended as tyrants. "It is the threat of paternalism further extended which should shake us into a realizing sense of our duties and our responsibilities as Americans, whatever party label we may wear upon our sleeves."

To be an American citizen in this, so wonderful an age in which we live, is the greatest blessing which any of us can enjoy. To have and to play a part in shaping and changing the course of history is the greatest opportunity with which any man or woman of any day or generation can be confronted. Such an opportunity is ours, and the responsibility for what the future shall bring forth rests upon each and every one of us. It is well for us once in a while seriously to consider our situation and endeavor to devise some way in which, by the proper or more efficient discharge of our duty, we may guarantee to posterity the transmission of our civilzation and that most priceless heritage, a democratic form of government.

It is not for mere doctrinal reasons or for the satisfaction found in successfully defending a position that we are concerned for the spread of democracy—not merely because democracy is the only scheme of organization yet wrought out that keeps the door of opportunity open and invites all men to their fullest development. We are interested, because, disguise it as we may, and postpone the acknowledgment of the fact as long as we will, the human family will eventually have to admit that under no other system can the world be made an even reasonably safe place in which to live.

It is a tremendous responsibility that rests on the shoulders of the American people and their representatives—this job of making the world safe for democracy. The fundamental article in the creed of the American democracy—call it the fundamental dogma, if you like—is the unchanging and unchangeable resolve that every human being, every individual, shall have his opportunity for his utmost development—his chance to become and to do the best he can. Democracy is not only a system of government, it is a scheme of society.

Justice—

is the end of government, it is the end of civil society. It has ever been and ever will be pursued, until it either will be obtained or until liberty be lost in the pursuit.

Did you ever stop to think that all of our laws, statutes, and decisions are but attempts to establish rights, remedy wrongs, and formulate precepts which derive their real force not from the judgment of courts but from their compliance in the minds of just men with the doctrine of right and justice, with the fundamental ideas of right and wrong, justice and injustice, liberty and tyranny, equality and unfairness, upon which all thoughtful men are in substantial agreement. By our Declaration of Independence we make equality before the law the real standard by which the justice or injustice of all governmental acts is to be measured.

Just now we are in the midst of far-reaching changes no man dare prophesy what some man may be able to accomplish tomorrow in any or all paths of activity. Despite the temporary so-called "depression", we live in the most prosperous and the greatest epoch in the history of mankind and are slowly but surely entering upon one even greater and more prosperous. It costs more to live in this day and generation than it did long ago, using dollars and cents as a measure, but it is worth all that it costs. For what you and I have and get and enjoy it costs us no more proportionately than it did our forbears; in fact, it does not cost as much, and we get much more. We are so prosperous and progressive and inclined to be so materialistic that it does us no harm to be reminded once in a while that our forefathers declared, and that the constitution of my State of Vermont provides that—

A frequent recurrence to fundamental principles and a firm adherence to justice, moderation, temperance, industry, and frugality are absolutely necessary to preserve the blessings of liberty and keep government free.

The wave of idealism on which we were all lifted to the skies has subsided and human nature has been exposed to be grasping, plotting, bargaining, and fighting, just as it was before, rather than ennobled, magnanimous, and wise, as so many had hoped it would be. In the language of the street it may be said of us and our day that we are dragging on the bottom in the trough of the wave. Or it may be said of our time as Matthew Arnold said of his:

It is wandering between two worlds—one dead, the other powerless to be born.

Yet, notwithstanding the chaos and confusion of today, the essential things of life remain, and the fundamentals are fast embedded in the rock on which civilization rests. The world is full of optimists who expect it to outlast all its troubles, full of men and women to whom a recognition of the difficulties to be encountered is a challenge to their ability to overcome them. It is a wonderful age in which we live; the possibilities it affords every rational human being for enjoyment and accomplishment are countless in number, stupendously staggering in character, and almost beyond our ability to comprehend. Even if we are now paying the price, more advancement has been made in all lines of world progress the last 50 years than in any other period of the same length in the history of mankind. That which has been accomplished in all lines of advancement and of endeavor is only as a drop in the bucket compared with the fullness of accomplishment of the years which are to be.

The world that is in the making is the world of generations to come. Those of us whose years are fairly full will be fortunate indeed if we see even the beginning of it. How long it will take to get it started is pure conjecture, but the youth of our day have a prospect of coming into an inheritance of great things accomplished and a prospect of greater things to be performed, beside which the accomplishments of the last 50 years will sink into utter insignificance. The possibilities are really beyond our ability to comprehend. The opportunities which the future affords are as countless as the sands on the shores of the sea. It must be so, for it cannot be otherwise. In spite of the present situation we all know that the world cannot retrograde. The Dark Ages cannot return; it is an insult to our intelligence to suggest to the contrary. George Bancroft says, "Dynasties perish, cities are buried, nations have been victims of error, or martyrs for the right, but humanity has always been on the defense, gaining maturity, universality, and power."

We know this to be true, and the sooner we refuse to assent to being hypnotized by those who would have us believe otherwise, and the quicker we assert the power that in us lies, the better it will be for all concerned. [Applause.]

In all our talk about government and democracy we should bear in mind the fact that it is not the making of the laws that most concerns us, but a thorough understanding of the fact that there can be no such thing as real democracy or popular government unless there be impartial and thorough-going administration and enforcement of the laws which the people make.

It matters not what the law may be, whether it involve the raising of revenue, the police protection of the body politic, or whatever it may be, just so far as the policies which the people decide upon are not put into effective operation, just so far we abandon the principles of real democracy.

Never was this truth more forcefully and sufficiently demonstrated and exemplified than by the disintegration and demoralization of the program of the N. R. A., through lack both of enforcement of and compliance therewith.

Experience joined with common sense
To mortals is a providence.

One cannot study or read understandingly the story of the accomplishments of our ancestors without being impressed by the wisdom they had and which they demonstrated in providing for the raising of revenue, the separation of church and state, and the establishment of educational institutions in the formation of the first government in these United States.

It is a far cry back to those days of the Plymouth Colony, but fundamentals have not changed; fads and fancies have danced their little day on the stage and made their exit into oblivion. The realities remain. The early settlers of America bequeathed to their descendants certain institutions, customs, manners, and opinions which are essential to and have contributed most successfully to the permanency of our republican form of government.

DeTocqueville says that when he contemplates and reflects upon the consequences of their primary acts he sees the destiny of America embodied in the first Puritan who landed on these shores. These hardy pioneers out of their experience proclaimed principles either scorned or unknown by the nations of Europe, which were and have been accepted as the creed of a great people, and, as someone has well said, that—

By them a path without a turn and a field without a horizon were opened to the explorer and to the ardent curiosity of man.
One of these days—

Said the late Senator Frank Greene, some time since in the United States Senate—this country is going to wake up to the sober realization that for a long time back the legislative signboards have been misleading, and that America has actually left the straight and narrow path that the fathers laid out for it, and left it long ago, and is on the broad highway to all the ills of bureaucracy and the corruption that goes with it that those very same fathers fled from Europe to escape.

He was opposed to the measure then under consideration because in his opinion it invoked a wrong theory and principle of civics or governmental policy, in that it would cause the Federal Government to do for its individual citizens that which they ought to do for themselves, or at least through their own voluntary and nonpolitical associations. "It is paternalism", said he, "the most subtle and sinister enemy of popular government."

Whatever history may teach with respect to the beneficent effects of paternalism and centralization in other countries and under other forms of government, we of the United States of America must oppose the further extension of both; must rely for the perpetuity of our institutions upon the functioning of the local governmental unit, for if experience teaches us anything, we must already have learned that John Fiske spoke truly when he said that the preservation of local self-government is of the highest importance for the maintenance of a rich and powerful national life.

The centralization tendencies in government have fastened their tentacles around the surviving representative of the most nearly perfect democracy ever created. The paternalistic state is cooperating to help strangle its child. The question which confronts you and me is, "Shall we stand idly by as accessories both before and after the crime?" I believe that the Government should be for and by the people, and the nearer it is kept to and of the people the better government we will have. "In proportion as government recedes from the people they become liable to abuse", says Governor Cass, and according to David Starr Jordan, "the end of government by the people is to fit the people to control their own affairs."

"This Government is built upon the principle that the locality is better qualified and better disposed to protect the citizen in the enjoyment of his essential rights and to serve him in all matters of social welfare than the Nation." John Sharpe Williams once said:

We hear a great deal about the horrors of war, but greater than these—in fact, the greatest of all horrors—is the murder of local self-government, the only possible field of development for individual manhood.

"Local assemblies of citizens constitute the strength of free nations", says DeTocqueville.

James Bryce says:

Self-government stimulates the interest of people in the affairs of their neighborhood, sustains local political life, educates the citizen in his daily round of civic duty, teaches him that perpetual vigilance and the sacrifices of his own time and labor are the price that must be paid for individual liberty and collective prosperity. Democracy needs local self-government as its foundation. That is the school in which the citizen acquires the habit of independent action, learns what is his duty to the State, and learns also how to discharge it.

The State, instead of further absorbing and assimilating the functions performed heretofore by local officials, should decentralize. Administrative supervision may be necessary, and probably is wise, but the local units should be encouraged, instead of discouraged, in their attempts to strengthen and fortify themselves, preserve their integrity, and conserve their rights.

To maintain vitality in the center without sacrificing it in the parts; to preserve tranquillity in the mutual relations of powerful States, while keeping the people everywhere, as far as possible, in direct contact with the Government; such is said to be the political problem which the American Nation exists for the purpose of solving, and is the problem which confronts us today.

Methods may change, but progress is still the watchword, and the Nation still lives in the strength and devotion of citizens whose powers have been developed, whose self-respect has been aroused under the American principle of local self-government. Our purpose is to build in this Nation a human society, not an economic system. It has been well said, and the story of the ages teaches that, no method of procedure has ever been devised by which liberty could be divorced from local self-government. No plan of centralization has ever been adopted which did not result in bureaucracy, tyranny, inflexibility, reaction, and decline.

Since this is so, and we know it is so, it is high time that we as representatives of the people, charged with a great responsibility, attempt to legislate as prompted by our own consciences, preserving our own intellectual integrity. Public confidence in the integrity and effectiveness of our democracy must not be permitted to be destroyed.

Certainly gentlemen—

As Edmund Burke said to the electors at Bristol, England, in 1774—

it ought to be the happiness and glory of a representative to live in the strictest union, the closest correspondence, and the most unreserved communication with his constituents. Their wishes ought to have great weight with him; their opinion, high respect; their business, unremitting attention. It is his duty to sacrifice his repose, his pleasures, his satisfaction, to theirs; and, above all, ever, and in all cases, to prefer their interest to his own. But his unbiased opinion, his mature judgment, his enlightened conscience, he ought not to sacrifice to you, to any man, or to any set of men living.

It follows therefore, as has been so well and truly said by Senator GLASS, that—

The public man who permits himself to pause long enough to inquire whether a thing is popular or unpopular, instead of seeking to know whether it is right or wrong, is not only useless but dangerous to his country. He is a coward to begin with and a menace always.

[Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BELL].

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago we heard a very inspiring Mother's Day address by the gentleman from California [Mr. McGROARTY].

Mr. Chairman, the cultural and spiritual values in life, the fires of patriotism in the minds and hearts of the American people are tremendously more important than the material things of life. Last Sunday morning I listened to a Mother's Day address by a man whom I regard as one of the great spiritual leaders of our country, one of the great ministers of our country. He is located here in Washington. I refer, Mr. Chairman, to Dr. Raphael H. Miller, pastor of the National City Christian Church of Washington, D. C. Dr. Miller delivered what I consider a patriotic address on Mother's Day, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the daily RECORD by including therein this address.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair states to the gentleman from Missouri that he should submit his request in the House.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, I understood from the Parliamentarian that I could do it at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Inasmuch as the gentleman's request is to include extraneous matter, the request must be submitted in the House.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, I am asking permission to insert this in the Appendix of the daily RECORD, not in the body of the daily RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's request will have to be submitted in the House.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. McLAUGHLIN].

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, last week in my congressional district in Nebraska, in my home city of Omaha, there was held a meeting designated in the press as a Republican rally, at which meeting an address was made by one of our distinguished colleagues, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Because of the statements and representations and arguments made in the course of that address, and because the address was made directly to the people whom I represent, and because it sought to persuade the people of my district that the aims of the administration are not designed to promote the best interests of the people of the Middle West, I feel that I should not permit the address of our colleague to go unanswered and unchallenged on the floor of this House.

In challenging the statements of my colleague I do not propose to deal in glittering generalities, but shall set forth precise facts and figures to demonstrate that the charge made against the administration is wholly false and unfounded and that the fact is that there has never been an administration in the history of this country which has been more friendly and sympathetic to the agricultural Middle West in its aims and purposes and in actual practice than the present Roosevelt administration. [Applause.]

The press reports of the visit of our colleague to Nebraska on the occasion of his address at the Republican rally or revival or resuscitation meeting, or whatever we may wish to call it, carried an interview in which Mr. FISH stated that he was receptive to the nomination on the Republican national ticket for President of the United States in 1936.

Having lived in Nebraska all my life, I feel that I can fairly sense the spirit and the wishes of its citizens. I have been in active touch with the people of my State throughout my life. I know their interests and I know their loyalties, and I say without hesitation that the Republican Party and its spokesmen choose unwisely when they choose the Middle West as a battleground in the campaign of 1936 on the issue of whether the Roosevelt agricultural program has benefited or harmed agriculture in that section of this country. The people of Nebraska are intelligent people. They are a fair-minded people. They are open to persuasion by logic and their minds are open to conviction. In no section of the country do the people take a more deep and serious interest in the national questions which affect their lives and the lives of the people of the country as a whole than in the State of Nebraska. And Nebraska is typical of the whole Middle West. They welcome citizens from other parts of the country who come to them to discuss national issues and do not close their ears to criticisms of the Government so long as that criticism is sound and constructive, and they welcome suggestions as to governmental policies which affect their interest, particularly as to agriculture. Of course, the people of the Middle West, including Nebraska, make proper allowance as election time comes around for political bias and prejudice. But as a direct consequence of the long post-war period of distress through which we have passed, with no tangible evidence of genuine concern upon the part of the National Government until the adoption of remedial measures by the Roosevelt administration, Nebraskans have a right to expect any and all critics of the present policies to be sincere, or, if not sincere, to be at least serious in what they say to us and about us.

Now, the keynote, we might say, of Mr. FISH's address to the Republicans at Omaha was contained in this outstanding statement, and we quote:

There is only one person responsible for the break-down and failure of the new-deal policies which are retarding recovery and prolonging the depression, and that is Franklin D. Roosevelt, who was the author of all these unsound experiments, including the N. R. A. and A. A. A., that are leading the country on to the rocks of bankruptcy, chaos, and disorder.

Let us see about that.

Now, at this time I am going to digress a little to comment on the claim of my colleague that the country is fast approaching the rocks of bankruptcy, chaos, and disorder.

Let us look at the facts. I am going to quote from a little country paper in Iowa, with respect to the credit and the financial stability of the United States. I want to pay a tribute now to the country editor in the agricultural sections whose heart beats in tune with the hopes and aspirations of the people; who has clear vision; who is actuated by the highest motives of patriotism, often even sacrificing financial welfare to continue his work of carrying to the people of his community intelligence concerning the state of the Nation. It is he who raises the signal of danger when the country is embarking on an unsound course and it is he who can appraise, and does appraise, the results of national legislation as it affects the country as a whole and the people with whom he is in direct contact.

I quote from the Fenton (Iowa) Reporter of a recent issue concerning the credit of this country as indicated by the market quotations on Government securities:

If 10 years ago you saw a note of yours sold at a 10-percent discount, and today you saw a similar note sold at a 6-percent premium, you would figure that your credit had improved. This is exactly what has happened to Uncle Sam. Using figures of the Standard Statistics Co. of New York on Government bond prices, we find that the yearly averages (stated in percentages of par) for the period 1918, through 1932, were as follows:

1918	96.7
1919	96.0
1920	90.9
1921	92.2
1922	99.5
1923	98.4
1924	101.1
1925	101.9
1926	102.0
1927	103.2
1928	102.6
1929	100.1
1930	102.6
1931	102.9
1932	100.2

What of Uncle Sam's credit now, you will ask. Using the same Standard Statistics' figures, or quotations from any metropolitan paper, we find that the average sale prices of Federal bonds on Saturday, May 4, 1935, was 106.3, or higher than at any time in the period listed above, even in the boom years. And this average includes bonds now barely selling above par because they have been called for redemption, otherwise the average would be above 110.

In addition, let me point out that our deposits of the 14,135 insured banks of the United States increased $3,000,000,000, or more than 9 percent, to a total of nearly $40,000,000,000 between June 30 and December 31, 1934, according to the statement of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

As has been pointed out on the floor of this House, the balancing of the Budget is, and must be, related to the current expenses and can have no bearing upon the extraordinary emergency expenditures which were necessary to save the people of this country from starvation and anarchy. But in the fiscal policy of this administration, let no one have the false impression that the welfare of this country is not guarded closely and carefully.

This is illustrated by the fact that the average rate of interest on Government public debt dropped from 2.957 percent on February 28, 1935, to 2.857 percent at the end of March 1935, as a result of the refunding during that month of $1,560,000,000 in fourth Liberty 4½-percent bonds into Treasury bonds bearing 2⅞ percent. And on March 31, 1934, with a total debt of $25,698,167,820, or $3,244,000,000 less than on March 31, 1935, and with an average interest rate of 3.234 percent the total interest charge was $831,111,908. This was $30,000,000 more than the total public debt interest charge at the end of March 1935.

So much, in passing, for the charge of my distinguished colleague that the country is going pell-mell and without check or hindrance directly to chaos and bankruptcy.

But to come back to direct effects of the new-deal policies upon the people of the Middle West, and especially the people of my district, in which Mr. FISH delivered his address.

As for the N. R. A.—Nebraska entered into the spirit of that law with a fervor and an enthusiasm which was commensurate with the patriotism of that section of the country. President Roosevelt described the N. R. A. as a great national cooperative effort to put people back to work at living wages and under conditions which would make room for millions then in bread lines. The people of the Middle West recognize the very apparent fact that while the agricultural-adjustment program would restore farm prices, the N. R. A. would enable city dwellers to resume the purchases of the products of the farm. They remembered the President's confident prediction in May 1933, when he signed the A. A. A., and again in June 1933, when he signed the N. R. A., that they were designed to operate in such a manner as to provide the necessary balance between industry and agriculture. He pointed out that neither could possibly be effective without public cooperation, and as in the vast majority of regions throughout the country, the people of the district I have the honor to represent and of every other district of my State, accepted the logic of the situation.

And they are familiar with the results. They know that in February 1933 wheat was quoted at 28 cents a bushel, but it did not always bring that figure, and that on April 15, 1935, it was actually bringing 89 cents a bushel. On the former date, corn was quoted at 12 cents a bushel. On the latter date it was selling at 92 cents a bushel. Potatoes were 33 cents just before the A. A. A. was inaugurated; they now sell at 90 cents. Hogs were $2.60 per hundredweight, as against the present price of $8.10; butter has gone up from 16 cents a pound to 34 cents, and butterfat from 14 cents to 34 cents; eggs from 8 cents a dozen to 19 cents.

The cash income of Nebraska farmers for the year 1932 was $162,533,000; for 1933—including $3,472,000 in benefit payments from processing taxes, which you will observe the ultimate consumer pays but without any clamor whatever—Nebraska farm income had risen to $183,716,000.

Mr. FISH said in Omaha:

I indict the new-deal administration on its record for the past year as the greatest failure in history.

He was still talking about the A. A. A. and its so-called "break-down." Yet the cash income of Nebraska farmers last year from the sale of their products, despite the worst drought in modern times, was $232,869,000. Including benefit payments of $29,916,000 from the processing tax, concerning which the purchasers of farm products have made little or no complaint, total cash income of Nebraska farmers in 1934 amounted to $262,785,000 plus $6,598,000 in receipts from the Government's cattle-purchase program.

Expressed in another way, the farm price index 2 years ago—February 15, 1933—was 49 percent of the pre-war average. On April 15, 1935, it was 111 percent of the pre-war average. And what of the other side of the picture? On February 15, 1933, the index of prices farmers have to pay for whatever they use was 102 percent of the pre-war parity. On April 15, 1935, despite partisan claims of the higher prices of everything, the index stood at only 128 percent of the pre-war average.

That is a factor which farmers more readily understand than Mr. FISH may have imagined, if he has ever given this vital subject any sympathetic consideration. Nebraskans know from experience, particularly during the meager years when the Republicans were amazingly neglectful of the crisis in agriculture, that as food prices went down the major part of the decline fell upon the farmer. The comparatively small losses encountered in processing and distribution, of course, fell upon the consumer. This was made crystal clear by Mr. Roosevelt in his analysis of the situation in 1932. The accomplishment of this parity, the recognition that the West needs the East and the East needs the West, was a problem the administration had to face, and, as usual, it was faced with a smile. It is excruciatingly painful to his old-guard detractors that the President, in tackling the tasks they so long shied away from, is actuated by faith in the fairness and common sense of the people. This seems particularly disconcerting to Mr. FISH, who happened to have grown up in the same community with Franklin D. Roosevelt, but whose apparent lack of a sense of economic equality drove him to the point of indiscretion at Omaha.

As has happened before well within the recollection of Nebraskans, it is evident that as the prices of farm commodities go up, the major portion of the rise goes directly to the farmer. According to the Consumers' Guide, monthly publication of the Agricultural Department, in February 1933, a month's supply of the first 10 essential foods cost a typical American family $15.42. In February 1935 they cost $21.41, an increase of 39 percent. But for the farm products used in making them, farmers in February 1933 received $5 and in February 1935, $9.77, an increase of 95 percent. In other words, an increase of 39 percent in customer price made possible an advance of 95 percent in farm prices, due to the joint operation of A. A. A. and N. R. A.

And if there is to be a continuation of these visits of the ultraconservative element of the Republican Party to those localities in which the people generally are striving to cooperate sincerely in the progress already made toward breaking the back of the depression, the visitors would be on a firmer ground if they could bring themselves to a realization of our outlook on this subject. First of all, Nebraskans are serious about it, and they know the program is not founded on selfishness or sectionalism. It would have been worth while to Mr. FISH to consider what our able Republican Senator GEORGE W. NORRIS said last month in a public statement:

I believe President Roosevelt is honestly and sincerely trying to bring the country out of the depression. The President was confronted with a condition never before confronted by any living man. Taken all in all, I believe President Roosevelt's program has done a vast amount of good. Merely because I feel that it has failed in this respect or in that respect, I do not believe we should try to overthrow it, but, rather, that we ought to help correct mistakes and improve its operation if we can.

This was not an ex-parte expression. Our distinguished senior Senator was answering an inquiry from a Nebraska Republican as to whether a critical personal campaign against the administration at Washington should be made.

It is interesting to observe that Congressman FISH did indulge in what can be termed "a critical personal campaign against the administration at Washington", and in doing so he must have considered his judgment superior to that of Senator NORRIS as to our President and the terrific task he is earnestly trying to conclude. At least, the Senator issued to the press in Washington his response to his constituent and it was widely commented upon.

And in ignoring this authentic reflection of sentiment in my State, Mr. FISH seemed to overlook also the array of statistics from private reporting commercial agencies and the New York banks, as well as the regular reports in Washington, which from day to day have depicted the steady increase in business all over the country and in nearly every individual line of industry and trade. He could scarcely neglect to observe that the Department of Commerce reported industrial production generally in the United States during the first quarter of this year as 10 percent over the corresponding period last year and the highest of any first quarter since 1930.

If not in his line of duty as a Member of Congress for 15 years, with a certain sense of responsibility, at least as one of the outstanding capitalists of the country, Mr. FISH's subconscious mind might have retained from contact with the daily press a very few recent developments that are calculated to attract and retain the interest of investors, such as that—

Employment in manufacturing establishments was up more than 2 percent and pay rolls had increased 9 percent in the last monthly statement from the Department of Labor over the corresponding month last year. In both consumer and durable-goods industries these gains were the fourth successive monthly increases. Building permits in 710 representative communities showed a gain during March and the first half of April of 74 percent over the corresponding 6 weeks of 1934. Electric power consumption during April attained the highest record in the history of industry as a result of lowering rates advocated by the President. For the final week of April total reserves of Federal Reserve banks were five thousand nine hundred and ninety-seven millions, as compared with four thousand seven hundred and sixty-three millions for the corresponding week in 1933. Steel industry pay rolls were 6 percent higher in March than in February and for the first quarter of 1934. Mail-order sales for the 4 weeks ending April 23 were 32½ percent above the same week in 1934, and the highest for the period since 1929. During April the 5-year high mark in production of automobiles and trucks reached in March was being steadily maintained. Revised figures by the National Industrial Conference Board showed more than $6,000,000,000 increase in the national income during the past year.

An increase of more than two hundred and nine million in income taxes paid during the first 4 months of 1935 over the same period last year, the enormous increases in postal receipts, carloadings, foreign trade, and all of the other criteria which citizens possessing even a mild interest in public affairs are accustomed to observe in their newspapers, these day-to-day developments effectively refute Mr. FISH's declaration in Omaha that "the President's program is destroying wealth and impoverishing the people."

The attempt of Mr. FISH to convince the Farm Belt that our agricultural export markets have been lost under the 2 years of Roosevelt revealed the strangest mental processes our people have encountered in recent political history. His warning that our wheat growers would wake up to find that our foreign markets have been lost did in fact wake them up but only to the audacity of assertion. That loss which at this late date so arouses the attention of Mr. FISH was incurred before the new deal was born. The subject was accurately treated by Walter Lippmann in a recent issue of the ultraconservative New York Tribune, as follows:

The problem which Roosevelt has been struggling with is the problem he inherited. He has an agricultural surplus on his hands because there is a currency and tariff disorder which has closed an important part of the export market. That is why he has a deficit. It is wrong. But are the conservative Republicans in any position to say that? Are they prepared to restore the exports by lowering the tariff? Are they prepared to liquidate the internal depression by reducing prices? The truth of the matter is that the Old Guard Republicans have no case against the administration because the thing they complain about, the deficit, is the consequence of the two policies—namely, the tariff and monopoly—with which they are identified.
